Ankarudden

Balazsi is pleased to announce Ankarudden, which is not presented as a traditional landscape, but as a working condition exposed to nature.

The exhibition takes its name from Ankarudden, in the Swedish archipelago, where van Arkel has recently established a new studio. The weather, light, and vegetation of the archipelago have strongly influenced his work.

Van Arkel's process combines careful preparation with active decision-making. Pigmented silicone is mixed, spread, and shaped, producing elements—using a roller mill—that function as physical brushstrokes. These elements are then selected, cut, moved, and assembled. Each step demands attention and balance, and every painting carries the memory of its own construction.

Silicone became central to van Arkel's practice through experimentation and experience, following his early training as an oil painter. The material allows a more expansive and direct approach, bridging painting and sculpture. Its transparency, strength, and durability support a process of accumulation and adjustment while maintaining a pronounced sense of surface. The stability of silicone ensures that the works endure over time, asserting themselves as solid, lasting objects. Color plays a key role in van Arkel's practice. The palette is wide and layered, enabling multiple tones to coexist. Color generates tension, rhythm, and movement, encouraging close attention. As forms accumulate, expand, and shift, associations with landscape emerge, creating spaces that remain open and changeable. These impressions arise both from the artist's working process and the viewer's perception.

Physical engagement is central to the experience of the work. The surfaces invite closeness, encouraging the viewer to engage through sight and touch, forming a personal response. Meaning emerges through this encounter. The exhibition presents painting as immediate, physical, and visual.

All works, except one, were created specifically for this exhibition.

Matthias van Arkel (b. 1967, Stockholm) lives and works in Stockholm. He studied at the Royal Institute of Fine Arts (Kungliga Konsthögskolan) and received his MFA (Master of Fine Arts) from the University of Arts, Crafts and Design (Konstfack), Stockholm.

Van Arkel's work begins with painting, but gently asks a wider question to explore what a painting can be today. Engaging in conceptual dialogues between painting, sculpture, and spatial installation, van Arkel works primarily with silicone, alongside bronze. Silicone is often considered industrial, but plays a significant role in his art practice with its flexible and responsive nature. Shaped by hand, it reacts directly and sensitively. It bends, stretches, and settles, acquiring an organic and almost bodily presence. This allows the works to be free from fixed positions; they don't stay still, but lean toward the viewer. In this way, van Arkel's works occupy a space between flat and three-dimensional.

For van Arkel, material is never just material. Through color, mass, repetition, and space, van Arkel explores how we sense the world and how we move within it. His works do not explain themselves. They invite us to slow down, to look from different distances, and even to touch them, in order to notice how perception changes as we move. Meaning appears gradually, through attention rather than instruction.

The titles of his works may sound simple, yet the works themselves often convey something tender, poetic, and powerful at the same time. Beneath their structured surfaces lies a sensitivity that is connected to him personally. Van Arkel's works do not seek to be fully understood at once; they linger, fostering a heightened awareness of one's own presence in the space between object and viewer.

Van Arkel has exhibited widely in Scandinavia, such as in Sweden and Denmark, as well as across Europe in Germany, France, Spain, the United Kingdom, and in the United States. He has also realized numerous permanent public art projects developed in close dialogue with architecture. His work is included in public and private collections throughout Europe and North America, including Moderna Museet, Stockholm.
