Educators

Educators can inspire their students to be lifelong learners or unintentionally make their lives a living hell. To prevent the latter, educators should act with fairness and objectivity in mind when assessing students' progress. Building trust and promoting learning also requires upholding every student's dignity, treating them with respect, and maintaining confidentiality. In the United States, the National Education Association \(NEA\) is the most suitable example of personal code of ethics guidelines for educators. Adopted in 1975, it covers how to treat students fairly and with respect and how to uphold the profession's integrity.
