

Master's Statement of Purpose #2

My academic objective is to pursue a Master's degree in International Relations with concentration in global security and political economy. This interest developed through undergraduate study in political science and sustained engagement with international policy analysis. Graduate education provides the analytical depth required to examine complex global systems and policy frameworks.

I earned a Bachelor of Arts in Political Science at Westbridge College, where coursework in international relations theory, comparative politics, and international economics formed the foundation of my academic focus. These courses emphasized analytical reasoning, policy evaluation, and structured argumentation. Exposure to global governance frameworks and security studies shaped my interest in international institutions and economic interdependence.

My academic training includes a senior thesis analyzing trade policy and regional security cooperation within emerging markets. The project required extensive literature review, data interpretation, and policy analysis. Through this work, I developed skills in academic research, critical evaluation of sources, and structured writing. The thesis process strengthened my interest in research-based policy assessment and international cooperation.

In addition to academic work, I completed an internship with a nonprofit organization focused on international development policy. Responsibilities included research support, policy brief preparation, and data synthesis for regional reports. This experience reinforced the connection between academic analysis and policy implementation while highlighting the importance of rigorous research in international decision-making contexts.

The Master's program in International Relations at Horizon University supports my academic goals through its focus on global security, political economy, and policy analysis. Faculty expertise in international institutions and economic governance aligns with my interests. The program's emphasis on research methods and policy-oriented coursework provides an environment suited for advanced academic development.

During graduate study, I aim to refine analytical skills and contribute to research projects addressing global security challenges. Short-term objectives include completing advanced coursework in political economy and international policy analysis. Long-term goals involve professional work in international policy research or governmental advisory roles, supported by continued academic engagement.

Graduate training at Horizon University offers the intellectual structure and research focus required for advanced study in international relations. My academic preparation, research experience, and defined goals demonstrate readiness for master's-level study and sustained contribution within the field.
