1. An Autobiography of a Struggling Student

Hi, I'm Teresa Johns, and my pursuit of knowledge has been filled with struggles. When I was a little child, I struggled with reading and writing. This often made me fall behind in classes and caused lots of confusion. When I started learning in middle school, I was diagnosed with dyslexia, and this changed everything. After learning about the cause of my struggles, my parents and teachers in school started supporting me with personalized learning tactics. Their support, as well as my dedication, helped me overcome my past challenges and become more confident in reading and writing. Thanks to staying dedicated, I managed to become an honor student over time. My journey taught me about the importance of a personalized approach and asking for help when you need it.

2. An Autobiography of a Student Interested in Science

My name is Jaden Klark, and I'm passionate about learning. Ever since I was a child, I enjoyed exploring new topics, and science quickly became my favorite subject. It fascinated me to seek scientific answers to all my "whys," such as why the sky is blue or why a plane can fly. Later, in school, my science teacher opened the world of scientific experiments, which made me even more interested in the subject. I could spend hours in a lab participating in various projects and exploring new scientific concepts. This passion is with me today, too. My big dream is to contribute to the fields and help find solutions to pressing environmental issues, which is why I want to study Environmental Science in college.

3. An Autobiography of a First-Generation Student

Hi, I'm Carlos Martínez, and I am the first one in my family to pursue a college degree. When I was a little child, my parents had to work hard to provide for us. They both had to start working early and couldn't go to college. Yet, they always emphasized the value of education, so I was determined to go to college. It was a challenging process - working hard to succeed in school, navigating the application process, and receiving a scholarship to afford my education. However, thanks to my dedication and the help from others, including my teachers and our school's guidance counselor, I got in. Now, I'm in my second year in college, and it's a challenging but inspiring journey of being a first-generation student.
