Hi, I'm Kelly Clyde, and I was raised in a working-class neighborhood. Both of my parents had manual labor jobs and had to work long hours to provide for our family. 2. An Upper-Class Person's Autobiography

My name is Daniel Welsh. I was born in an upper-class family and grew up in a neighborhood where other families were wealthy too. My parents run a successful business and gave me all the material things I could wish for. Nevertheless, being raised in a privileged community also had a bad impact on me. I've also always had this feeling that people treat me in a certain way, not because of who I am, but because of my family. Growing older, I was exploring the inequalities in society and found my passion in helping others. Currently, I'm pursuing a career in nonprofit, hoping to make our world a better place.

I'm Luiza Martinez, and I'm a child of immigrants. My parents moved to the US in pursuit of a better life for me and my brothers. The financial struggles of our family made me realize the massive importance of education for building a stable career. So I've put all my effort into earning a degree. I studied long hours, gained diverse experience, and applied for multiple scholarships and grants to get accepted to a college. I became the first person in my family to attend college, and this journey has taught me a lot. I know that better lives for future generations are built through determination and hard work.

Still, I always knew the sacrifices and hard work my parents made to create this kind of life for us. As I was in school, I noticed how other students' lives were different from mine.
