

Sentient Singularity Theory:

The Theory of Everyone

Tyler Goldstein

Abstract:

Sentient Singularity Theory is a proposal for a fundamental metaphysics framework. Sentient Singularity Theory describes the totality of fundamental existence as an initial and all-encompassing singularity of sentience that is creating additional sentient singularities within Itself.

Sentience is a nature or state characterized by experience of feeling sensations, emotions, and a sense of self. Singularity is defined as something that is one distinct unit, or as something that is especially unique. Sentient Singularity theory also denotes a singularity as a structure that has the property of intrinsic and indivisible oneness.

Sentient Singularity Theory can therefore be understood to describe that Existence Itself is a single universal sentient being that is producing an infinitely growing number of additional sentient beings within itself. These additional singularities of sentience or self-aware beings are arranged into a nested quasiperiodic fractal pattern of stacked holonic structures composed of a single self-reflective knot of perception heading an assembly body integrating multiple entangled strings of information.

Every sentient singularity observes and orients using the four primary perspectives, which are: “inside”, “outside”, “separate”, and “oneness.” These four perspectives are interdependent and entangled, as the awareness of any one of them simultaneously entails the awareness of all four. The self-referential and co-defining characteristics of the four primary perspectives enable the perception, relation, and orientation of oneself in fundamental contexts that transcend relativistic observations.

Sentient Singularity Theory characterizes the fundamental building blocks of the cosmos to be sentient beings, and that sentience is the universally defining nature and animating feature of the most fundamental structures in existence. Sentient Singularity Theory attempts to display how space, time, matter, force, and all other physically observable phenomena are generated by the actions, perceptions, and cognitive processes of interacting sentient beings.

If sentience is the nature of every single fundamentally existent structure, then a truly foundational theory that unifies and contextualizes all other true scientific theories is more than just a "Theory of Everything", it's a "Theory of Everyone".

Beyond the beginning, Sentience Exists, Existence is Sentient, and Sentience is One.
