

A Tribute to John Daly

(August 30, 1944 - June 24, 2022)

You may have seen John Daly's wall-sized photographic windows on the world. A dozen of his most stunning photographs now appear in this online gallery documenting the beauty of places and seasons and cultures associated with indigenous California. During his battle with cancer, John wanted very much to contribute to the spirit of this work, so what started as one photographic contribution grew into the collection that now appears in Walk the Good Road.

As a photographer, writer and sociologist, John's interest in people and in natural wonders impelled him to share his creative gifts. The photographs with his byline on this website represent a dozen or more among many examples. We hope John's masterful images will help the viewer to think more deeply about the significance of the places and peoples referenced—and will also remind others to see creative acts as gifts of honor and service.

May we all exchange our talents for the common good. May we see clearly through the filters of dust those exchanges stir, letting the particles drift into layers of oneness beneath our feet as, together, we walk the good road ahead.
