Contemporary design exists across several scales of production. On one side are large factories and advanced manufacturing facilities capable of producing objects in high volumes. On the other are small workshops working with limited editions and reviving the culture of craftsmanship.

It is precisely between industry and craft, between mass production and the unique object, that the field of contemporary design takes shape. At the center of this dialogue lies a fundamental question of form-making: what comes first – the idea or the method of its materialization? Does technology determine the form of an object, or does form dictate the method of production? Is every design object potentially reproducible? And where does the boundary lie between a utilitarian object and functional art?

Ukrainian design today demonstrates a high level of adaptability – both in approaches to form-making and in production processes. Manufacturers continuously respond to new challenges, combining manual and automated technologies. Designers work simultaneously with industrial production, small workshops, and craft practices, shaping a flexible system of object creation.

The Ukrainian collective exhibition proposes considering form as a point of intersection between idea, material, and method of production.

The exhibition unfolds through three directions: Industrial Design, Craft, and Functional Art.

Together, these approaches demonstrate how contemporary Ukrainian designers operate between industry, craftsmanship, and artistic experimentation. Within this interaction, form becomes a tool for understanding the relationship between idea, material, and production method.
