When Zero Doesn't Mean Zero: What a property tax freeze does, and doesn't, tell us about the cost of running a city?

This article looks at a recent property tax survey asking citizens if they would prefer a property tax freeze with reduced public services or to pay more to maintain the services. The article discusses the options, examining what is meant by a property tax freeze, the expenses faced by Vancouver and what happens when there is a budget deficit.

A costly property tax reckoning is due for Ontario homeowners

This article looks at the inevitable increase that will take place in property tax assessments when a revaluation is finally called. The article reports that the average home price in Ontario has gone up by 91% since the last assessment in 2016 and advocates equal property taxes reflecting that all residents have equal access to government services.
