Precision Ag Summit Focuses on Farming Smarter

Saskatchewan farmers joined Western Sales experts, John Deere leadership and trusted industry partners at the new Western Sales dealership in Rosetown on June 18th for the Precision Ag Summit.

The event highlighted both the future of agriculture and how producers can maximize the technology already available today. Attendees explored how connected equipment, Operations Center, JDLink™ Boost, See & Spray™ and emerging autonomous solutions are improving efficiency and profitability on the farm.

"We know that the stakes are getting higher all the time for our customers," said Corey Leonard, Vice President of Precision Ag with Western Sales. "Inputs are constantly increasing. What our platform enables our customers to do is to understand the litres of fuel that are being used per acre, their cost per bushel, the litres of chemical that are being used, and the automation features to make sure that their dockage is appropriate for what they're looking for."

Maverick Ag's Evan Shout opened the day by discussing the growing amount of data available to producers and the opportunities it creates. "The amount of data that goes through—not only the machines, but from a financial aspect, from your bookkeeping to your production aspect, there's more data in agriculture than any other industry. The only thing we haven't done yet is figure out a way to utilize it and start making decisions."

Additional presentations from Travis Jensen of Canoe Financial, Steve Shirtliffe from the University of Saskatchewan's College of Agriculture and Bioresources, and John Deere Chief Technology Officer, Jahmy Hindman, highlighted the innovation being driven by Canadian producers.

For Elrose producer Jodi McDonald, Precision Ag is about simplifying decision-making in the field. "We should be focusing on tools like AutoPaths and Work Planner, not necessarily because they take work off your plate. There's still work involved for me in setting everything up and managing it. The real benefit is being able to send that information directly to the machine so the operator has fewer decisions to make once they get to the field. They spend less time pushing buttons and setting up the field, which saves time and helps reduce engine hours on the equipment."

Grant McGrath, President of AgriWestern Dealer Group, said growing connectivity allows dealerships to provide more proactive support to producers. "We can be another set of eyes, monitoring what's happening and making adjustments in real time," McGrath said. "In many cases, issues can be addressed remotely without requiring a technician to travel to your farm."

McGrath added advancements in connectivity and precision agriculture technology are changing how producers interact with their equipment and support teams. The summit concluded with discussions on how data-driven technology, automation and remote support are expected to play an increasingly important role in Saskatchewan farming operations.
