This is What Justice Looks Like

Sarah Driver has worked for 25+ years at local, state, and international levels on a range of justice issues from education reform and workplace equity to human trafficking and spiritual abuse. She has studied Scripture with a justice lens for two decades. In living, studying, and working on four continents, Driver has seen first-hand how injustices work in different contexts and what approaches work (and don't work) in confronting them. She holds a master's degree in social policy and development from the London School of Economics. She has been both a perpetrator and victim of injustice.

I started to realize how many Christians in my circles were under-resourced to both identify the injustices closest to them and to confront them effectively.

People want to confront injustice and my work is fueled by grief that they haven't been equipped for the work God is calling them to do. My spiritual trauma at the hands of church leaders who said and thought they were passionate about justice crystallized the difference between a passion for justice in theory and the real world capacity to make justice happen in our actual lives. I walked out of one particular meeting with a regional leader realizing we needed to be proactively equipping Christians for this work. We aren't born knowing it, but we're called to do it and the results when we aren't equipped are devastating.

May we be a people preventing, recognizing, confronting, and helping communities rebuild well after the devastation of injustice.
