RAW CLOISONNÉ

ESTHER ALEXANDRA KURLE

Berlin-based contemporary painter

Esther Alexandra Kurle is a Berlin-based painter working within Neo-Expressionism, developing a distinctive visual language she calls Raw Cloisonné – bold, large-format works structured by heavy black outlines and driven by expressive color.

In her early years, she was part of Frankfurt's graffiti scene, an experience that left a lasting imprint on her approach to line, scale and visual presence.

With a background in international film and advertising, she brings a trained eye for image impact, composition and visual communication.

Her works emerge from these memories: from travels, encounters, atmospheric light, and those rare moments between work and movement when you can truly feel the pulse of a city.

Through her botanical, colorful, and often cinematic paintings, Esther aims to convey precisely this feeling: the sensation of stepping out of everyday life for a moment.

Her paintings are not meant to simply decorate spaces, but to transform them. They bring warmth, color, nature and atmosphere into homes, like small windows into other worlds. A reminder that beyond appointments, routines and screens, there is still beauty, freedom and imagination.

Anyone who looks at one of her works should not just see a picture, but for a moment feel what Esther felt on her travels: longing, tranquillity, wanderlust, and the magic of a special moment.

Nature, remembered.

The Botanical series is not an attempt to reproduce nature as it is seen, but as it is remembered.

Plants, fruits and landscapes become carriers of sensation, place and memory. Through bold contours, saturated color and cinematic composition, Kurle transforms fragments of the natural world into emotionally charged images.

The focus is not on nature itself, but on the artist's memories of it – bringing fragments of the natural world indoors, intensifying them and making them present again.
