

Since the Renaissance, many attempts have been made to develop ideal cities in which perfect and sustainable communities would live, planned in rational and geometric styles. Suggesting the complexity of utopian cities, organized by the principles of symmetry and ideal forms, the Arches dining chair shows details that seem drawn from large architectural structures, with arches crossed on different levels. The raised backrest stands out from the remaining set, whereas a folded brass bar arises as a support element that prevents the contact of the arches with the floor.
