8. Information for patients – secondary use of data for scientific purposes

Type I allergic reactions occur in conditions such as hay fever, asthma, eczema, hives, food, insect and drug allergies. Various tests are available to detect these reactions. The skin prick test (SPT) is the global standard because it is quick, inexpensive and safe. This test has been performed manually for more than 60 years, but this sometimes leads to inaccurate results due to human errors.

Hippo Dx has therefore developed a new device: the Skin Prick Automated Test (S.P.A.T.), which performs the skin prick test automatically and with great precision. Clinical studies show that this device provides more reliable and consistent results. The assessment is performed using an AI system that measures skin reactions. Hippo Dx uses already available, coded data from the routine use of the S.P.A.T., such as test results and photos of skin reactions, to check whether the device is working properly and to gain new insights into allergies.

For more information about the ongoing research activities, you may reach out to Hippo Dx using the below contact details.
