Swadeshi wave in Indian stock markets

When Prime Minister Narendra Modi came to power in 2014, one of his first and most intelligent economic moves was to change a single alphabet. In a twist to swadeshi, he transformed 'Made in India' to 'Make in India'. By a stroke that changed a 'd' to 'k' he ensured that economic nationalism was not about making in India and consuming here, but making in India for India and the rest of the world. Since the tensions with China in the Northeast, swadeshi came back with a flourish. Boycott Chinese goods. Make them in India.

Swadeshi sentiments became stronger in the recent times due to punitive American tariffs on Indian goods. In this political period, what is forgotten is the ongoing nationalist wave in the Indian stock markets. Time and again, in the recent past, one witnessed a unique trend. Normally, investors, whether Indian or foreign, sell together during bad times or in bearish markets. In some cases though, while the foreigners have sold, Indians have emerged as enthusiastic buyers. For example, during the June quarter, global funds withdrew $4 billion from Indian stocks. But mutual funds, which receive money from the locals, added almost $5 billion only in July. This trend indicates several crucial issues. The first is that the foreigners are dictated by global events, not just the Indian ones. In the trading of domestic stocks, however, investors are largely driven by local factors, and the health of the Indian economy. It is true that interest rate changes in the US, or American tariffs matter.
