

Redefining the collaborative workplace

Hybrid working has become the norm for many organisations. They need to create environments that feel seamless and consistent, wherever work happens, while rethinking office space to focus on experiences people can't get at home. With the right design, technologies and support, workspaces can become flexible and collaborative. They can improve productivity, minimise friction, strengthen inclusivity and help retain talent.

Connecting spaces, places and interfaces

To optimise the working environment, organisations must connect:

Spaces
Physical and digital environments where work happens

Places
Workplaces with meaning, where culture and connection happen

Interfaces
The digital layer connecting people to spaces and each other

When these are seamlessly connected, organisations can maximise efficiency, enhance experiences and ensure everyone feels equally included.

Six ways to transform collaboration experiences

1

Make the commute worth it

Employees come to the office for connection and collaboration. Organisations need to provide a compelling reason to return and make it easy to plan a productive day.

2

Improve inclusivity and meeting equity

Workspaces should support different needs and working styles, ensuring everyone can hear and be heard in meetings, whether in person or remote.

3

Eliminate inconsistent experiences

Inconsistent room standards and fragmented systems can reduce effectiveness. Standardisation helps deliver reliable collaboration experiences across locations.

4

Keep pace with the speed of technological change

Collaboration platforms are rapidly evolving. Organisations need solutions that can adapt and align with changing business priorities.

5

Address digital skills and training gaps

Without the right support, employees may not fully use available tools. Training and guidance help embed technology into everyday work.

6

Continuously measure and redesign

Organisations need to track how spaces and tools are used, using insights to optimise environments and improve efficiency over time.
