The term "Bruh" has been around since the mid-19th century, with a significant spike in usage around 1850 compared to modern times. Its origins can be traced back to the shortened form of "brother," and it is often used as an informal way of addressing friends or expressing emotions such as exasperation, joy, and disbelief. People use "Bruh" to replace interjections like "wow," "seriously," "yay," "no way," and "c'mon." The term can be used to address anyone, regardless of gender, as long as they are okay with it. Initially, "Bruh" was used as a familial name to call friends, but over time, it has evolved into a word that shows shock and displeasure. People often use "Bruh" in response to a less-than-informed question or when someone says something uninformed. It can also be used to show excitement or enthusiasm. Some common uses of "Bruh" include greeting a friend, expressing disappointment or frustration, responding to an uninformed statement, or reacting strongly to something. When someone says "bruh," it's often an informal way of saying "are you serious?" or "what are you talking about?" In conclusion, the term "Bruh" has come a long way since its origins in the 19th century. Its versatility and ability to convey various emotions make it a popular choice among friends and acquaintances alike. She uses "bruh" as a term of endearment, similar to "friend" or "homie". It can also convey exasperation or disbelief, implying that she's addressing you in a casual manner. When used for girls, it doesn't mean they're seen as men, but rather as close and comfortable friends.
