Silicon Valley and San Francisco are approximately 50 minutes away by car from Oakland, with train travel taking around 15 minutes. The city has many neighborhoods, which can be vague or informal, depending on who you ask (long-time residents versus real estate agents) and when (old names might fade as new areas emerge). Neighborhood boundaries often blur due to hidden creeks, freeways, or recent construction. Some neighborhoods have official Planning Districts labels. Traditionally, Oakland neighborhoods don't use the definite article "the" before their names, unlike some San Francisco neighborhoods. This is changing, especially among newcomers, potentially marking gentrification. Here's a breakdown of Oakland neighborhoods grouped by district, based on the 1981 Greenstreets map: North: [insert list] Note that Yelp and Craigslist have different neighborhood boundaries. Urban Strategies created a map combining neighborhoods with census tracts. The 1906 Husted's Business Directory lists various districts, localities, parks, and tracts from Alden to Yoakum.
