Why Latin Series-Study of the Mother Tongue

By the study of language is meant the study of one's own language, but the study of one's own language is achieved by incomparably better by the indirect method of studying another language. Only so can the necessary processes of comparison be effectively instituted.

Latin is of value because it confers a mastery over the resources of one's mother tongue. This mastery comes as the direct and necessary result of careful daily translation-a process involving on the one hand a careful consideration and analysis of the thought of the author being read, and on the other a severe and laborious comparison of the value of alternative English words, phrases, and sentences, with the consequent attainment of skill in making the same effective as vehicles of expression.
