You have the right to know about any outstanding warrants against you in West Virginia. Under the state's Public Records Act, citizens can inspect and copy records maintained by law enforcement agencies. However, some warrant records are restricted due to privacy concerns. If you want to find out if you have a warrant in West Virginia, you can contact the state police or visit your county sheriff's department website. They may also provide information on outstanding warrants online or at their offices. Additionally, you can submit a request to the state police for a $20 fee and have them conduct background checks to see if you have an active warrant. You can also reach out to your local court or clerk to inquire about any outstanding warrants. Online databases can help you search for warrant information in West Virginia as well. Jurisdictions can also maintain records through third-party websites. While these sites make it easier to access information, the data may vary since they're not government-run sources. To get a warrant record from a third-party site, you might need to provide: The suspect's personal info Information about the issuing officer Where the warrant was issued. In West Virginia, how long a warrant stays active depends on the type of offense that led to it. All states have a statute of limitations that determines when someone can be prosecuted for a crime. In WV, there's no time frame for prosecuting felonies except perjury. This means if you've committed a felony and have an outstanding warrant, you could still be arrested by law enforcement even after a long time has passed. On the other hand, warrants issued for perjury only stay active for three years. People who find active warrants during a West Virginia warrant search are advised to consult a lawyer because the warrant will always be there, and nobody can evade it forever. An experienced attorney can help get a reduced punishment by knowing the proper steps to take. The timeframe for getting a warrant in WV varies depending on factors like warrant type, judge availability, and whether the facts of the warrant complaints establish probable cause. Generally, law enforcement officers should be able to obtain warrants within minutes or hours. A search warrant in West Virginia is a legal document that allows law enforcement officials to search a person, place, or property. Properties include books, documents, papers, electronic information, and digital data (like social media accounts). The purpose of a search warrant is to find items used for illegal activities or evidence in a case. In WV, authorized persons who can issue search warrants include judges, justices, and mayors/judges of police courts. A West Virginia search warrant permits the search of properties and authorizes the seizure of properties if they're stolen, embezzled, or obtained by false pretense. It also allows the seizure of items designed or used to commit a criminal offense. A West Virginia search warrant must be executed and returned to court within ten days of issuance. If a warrant is issued without probable cause, it becomes invalid due to the US Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable searches and seizures. Individuals wrongfully subjected to an unlawful search and seizure can seek return of their property through a petition. Additionally, they might file a motion to suppress evidence obtained from the seized items using one of two grounds: The property was taken illegally without a warrant. The warrant affidavit lacks sufficient information or contains inaccuracies. The warrant was issued based on insufficient probable cause. The warrant's execution did not comply with legal requirements. If the court grants this motion, it will result in all seized properties being returned. The state's laws also say that people can be arrested for crimes against public justice even if there's no warrant. In cases where child support payments aren't made on time, the court might issue an arrest warrant. This is because West Virginia considers it important to enforce payments that are meant to support children. If a non-custodial parent doesn't pay their child support order for at least six months, they could face fines or jail time. A bench warrant in West Virginia can be issued if someone fails to follow a court's orders or verdicts. This might happen because of unpaid fines, not showing up in court when summoned, or not doing the community service required by the court. These warrants stay active until the issue is resolved and can lead to arrests at any time. If someone is supposed to show up in court but doesn't, they could get a warrant for failure to appear. This might result in jail time, fines, or having their driver's license suspended. In West Virginia, if you miss a court date within 15 days of being summoned, the clerk can notify the DMV, which could lead to your license being taken away. The length of time someone stays in jail for missing court varies depending on the type of case and the specific laws applied. In West Virginia, missing a court date can result in being guilty of the original offense, with penalties ranging from 1 to 5 years for felonies and up to a year or less for misdemeanors. Additionally, those who miss court due to being admitted to bail or released as material witnesses will be considered guilty of a misdemeanor. Failure to pay court-ordered fines, surcharges, or restitution can lead to bench warrants. One common instance is failure to pay child support, which may result in legal consequences. A no-strike warrant allows law enforcement to enter a property without prior notice, issued when evidence destruction, suspect escape, officer endangerment, or police shootouts are potential risks. To perform a federal warrant search, online or in-person options are available, with the fastest method being an online request. For West Virginia DMV, they do not check for outstanding warrants during license applications or renewals; instead, notifications from courts will suspend licenses until the warrant is cleared.
