Google Launches Interactive Baseball Game for Fourth of July Google has created a new interactive animation to celebrate the Fourth of July, which lets users play a game of baseball with their favorite foods. The game features characters based on popular American foods such as hot dogs, popcorn and corn on the cob, and allows players to compete against an outfield of peanuts. According to the Associated Press, Baseball Commissioner Rob Manfred noted that while season ticket sales have dipped, day-of-game sales are up 6%. This trend might be influenced by an upcoming Google Doodle, which aims to encourage Americans to attend a baseball game. The doodle's release coincides with Independence Day celebrations in the United States. The first-ever Google Doodle was launched as a simple "out of office" message when company founders Larry and Sergey went on vacation. Over the years, doodles have become increasingly complex and creative, including animated versions and same-day releases. Notably, doodle artists often go on to become professional artists after participating in contests like the Google Doodle for Students contest. The process of creating a doodle can vary greatly, from hours to years. Each year, hundreds of doodles are released worldwide, sometimes simultaneously in different locations. One recurring character is Momo the Cat, named after a real-life team pet. Other notable facts include the use of the term "doodler" for these artists and the interactive nature of some doodles, such as the recent BBQ-themed game. The US Independence Day interactive Doodle features a fun baseball game where you play with food items from July 4th celebrations. You have a team made up of foods like hot dogs and hamburgers, and try to hit home runs while avoiding three strikes. The game is simple yet challenging, requiring good timing to swing the bat. There's also a 3D element to the graphics, adding to the fun. After playing, you're rewarded with one of nine vintage baseball cards.
