Market Overview

September extended the recovery in digital assets, although gains were more measured than in August. Bitcoin rose approximately 6.5% during the month, while Ethereum gained around 8.8%. Demand through regulated investment products remained strong. US spot Bitcoin ETFs recorded approximately $2.65 billion in net inflows, while spot Ethereum ETFs attracted roughly $832 million. Both totals were below August's levels but indicated that investor demand continued beyond the initial rebound.

The macro environment became more challenging. On September 16, the Federal Reserve raised its target rate by 25 basis points to 3.75%–4.00%, while policymakers' median projection indicated another increase before year-end. With inflation still above target and economic activity strong, the prospect of near-term monetary easing receded. Long-term borrowing costs also increased, with the US 10-year Treasury yield rising approximately 53 basis points over the month.

Geopolitical developments reinforced those inflation concerns. Stalled US–Iran peace talks and pressure on energy supplies contributed to an approximately 14% increase in Brent crude during September. Higher oil prices complicated the outlook for inflation and monetary policy, keeping developments in the Middle East central to market sentiment.

US digital asset regulation saw uneven progress. The CLARITY Act failed to advance in the Senate on September 15, delaying broader market structure reform. Two days later, the SEC introduced a temporary, conditional "Innovation Exemption" permitting certain tokenized US-listed stocks to trade on blockchain-based venues, a tangible step toward integrating digital asset infrastructure with traditional markets.

Overall, crypto gains and continued ETF inflows show investor demand remained supportive despite tighter monetary policy. Heading into October, the sustainability of ETF flows, the direction of Treasury yields and oil prices, and further US regulatory developments are likely to determine whether the recovery continues.
