What was life like for Nuri and Afra as a family in Aleppo? Imagine having your entire life turned upside down, forced to leave everything behind, just like they did. Their journey across Europe, on their way to Great Britain, was filled with hardships, hatred, prejudice, and physical dangers. What specifically horrified you during that journey? The trauma from their experience has left both Nuri and Afra deeply scarred. It's as if the couple is now separated by an unbridgeable gulf. Nuri thinks of Afra as "locked in," which makes one wonder what behavior leads him to such an assessment. Nuri feels he's no longer worthy of Afra or her forgiveness. Why does he believe that? He feels this way because of their shared experiences and the burden he carries from their journey together. Imagine being in a state of limbo, unable to move forward with your life yet unable to return to what you had before. What would it be like for Nuri and Afra, and millions of others in similar situations? This is the kind of dislocation and uncertainty that many face today. Has reading "The Beekeeper of Aleppo" changed your understanding or empathy towards refugees? Or does the scale of this problem feel too vast to fully grasp? Lastly, does "The Beekeeper of Aleppo" offer any hope for a better future? In "The Beekeeper of Aleppo", a family's world is shattered when their life in war-torn Syria is destroyed, forcing them to embark on a perilous journey across Europe in search of safety and hope.
