

THE Perfect Blend

Combining luxury living with a client centric approach has enabled Ward & Co to create harmonious spaces across the Caribbean. Julia Millen spoke to founders, Rosie and Sarah Ward to find out about their most recent pairing

Great interior design should never compete with the Caribbean. It should belong to it. British interior design studio Ward & Co has taken that philosophy across the Caribbean, building a portfolio that includes some of the region's most prestigious residential developments.

From branded residences and world-class resorts to private beachfront homes, every project is shaped by its surroundings rather than a predetermined house style. The studio is currently designing 27 branded residences at Nobu Beach Inn in Barbuda, following discussions with Robert De Niro and the Nobu development team.

“The brief was to create interiors that feel authentic, comfortable and purposeful, blending casually eclectic design with natural linens, tactile fabrics, subtle colour palettes and layered textures that allow each residence to feel individual,” explains Rosie. This same philosophy defines every Caribbean commission the company undertakes. In

Antigua, Ward & Co recently completed Akaya Horizon, a striking contemporary beachfront home where architecture and interiors work seamlessly with the coastal setting.

In Nevis, the studio is also delivering two projects within Four Seasons, while its work at the exclusive Oil Nut Bay development in the British Virgin Islands further reflects the calibre of projects entrusted to the practice. Although every commission has its own character, they all begin with an understanding of place, climate and the way people want to live. For anyone planning a luxury home in the Caribbean, the search for the right interior designer may well end with Ward & Co.
