BoJ: Taper, Trade (Uncertaintie es) & (Policy) Tensions

- It is a given that the BoJ will not take any policy action, but just because nothing happens does not mean that nothing matters. Instead, markets will be scrutinizing; i) guidance on "taper"; ii) the BoJ's response to/reservations about trade uncertainties likely muting any overt stance and; iii) evolving policy tensions.
- tensions.

 Taper: For a start, markets expect the BoJ to announce a step-down in the pace of taper to alleviate the brutal ascendancy in ultra-long (30Y) JGB yields. Specifically, expectations appear to be converging on a significant step-down (from a reduction of ¥400 billion in monthly JGB purchases per quarter (through March 2026) to reduction of ¥200 billion in monthly JGB purchases per quarter from April 2026. Whilst an argument may be made for a more urgent dial back in the pace of taper (to a reduction of ¥200 billion/month per quarter staring July 2025), the BoJ may not desire having premature taper dial back being interpreted as a dovish backlip. Instead, it may opt to apportion taper across the JGB curve more judiciously, so as to dampen upside pressures (sharp rise) in long in JGBs (yields). The warming is that an absence of plans to dial back the pace of taper could potentially trigger another leg of sell-off ultra-long JGBs that send 30Y yields sharply higher. And at pain of destabilising markets. So this is a high-stakes guidance.
- guidance.

 (Gauging) Tariff Uncertainties: While a rate hold will not surprise, the exact impact of trade/tariff uncertainties on policy calculus may be deemed consequential. Specifically, with regards to whether the BoJ is merely pausing briefly, or suspending (until further assurances) this hiking cycle. Governor Ueda might lean towards the latter given heightened uncertainties significantly elevated the threat of adverse demand shocks. If so, JGB yields may be better subdued.

 (Risk & Objective) Tensions: Finally, markets will have to assess various dimensions of policy tensions-pertaining to risks involved and objectives pursued (balance sheet vs JGB stability, monetary policy tradeoffs and fiscal-monetary independence).

 All said, the sense is that the meetings will leave observers with more questions than answers. The low
- bar is to leave markets somewhat more confident about JGB market (and JPY) stability. The challenge is to maintain maximum BoJ optionality for, and uncompromised credibility of, the BoJ.

 BSP: Steady Easing
 BSP is expected to ease by another 25bps at the upcoming meeting.
 Afterall, there remains much policy room for BSP to cut. Real rates are still elevated despite the cuts due to continued dis-inflation, while inflation outlook looks manageable amid soft oil prices and decent food beneets. In fact. RSP bad noted that risks to inflation. looks manageable amid sort oil prices and decent rook harvests. In fact, BSP had noted that risks to inflation were broadly balanced in 2025-2027 and acknowledged that the "more manageable inflation outlook and the downside risks to domestic economic activity allow for a shift towards a more accommodative monetary policy stance."

April 1997 | April s: CEIC: Miz

- Indeed, Q1 GDP was on the softer side, with growth predominantly driven by government spending, as faster growth in goods & services imports saw net exports plummeting. Meanwhile, percentage of non-performing salary loans continue to hover at levels higher compared to pre-pandemic levels, while nonperforming credit card receivables have seen an uptick

- As things stand, there are some risks of a jumbo 50bps cut given elevated real policy rates, but we think the risks are small as BSP has reiterated that it will take a "measured approach" towards further monetary easing and had previously commented that cuts would come in clips of 25bps.

CBC: Holding Firm

- We expect the CBC to hold rates at their policy meeting (19 June) as growth and external demand remains firm.
- demand remains firm.

 Specifically, industrial production in April grew a robust 8.8% MoM on a seasonally adjusted basis. Exports growth was also resilient in April and despite the liberation day complications, exports to the US still grew a staggering 29% YoY. A 60% surge in exports to the ASEAN region points to a likely ramping up of production to capitalise on the 90 day window.
- Headline and core inflation declined to 1.6% in May. This came on the back of lower prices for fuel and vegetables as well as apparel which was due to Mothers' Day discounting.
- After the slew of macroprudential measures, it appears that property prices have also stabilised rather
- After the size of infactopic underliar integrations, it appears that property prices have also stationised ratine than surge higher to dial back concerns of an overheating market.

 As for the TWD, the appreciation pressures remain largely on the back of unresolved tariff issues with the US which will worries USD exposed insurer and exporters who continue to look for hedging opportunities.

 Looking beyond the hold this coming meeting, we retain our expectations for the CBC to embark on a small 12.5bp cut in Q3 as growth strains start to appear as front loading needs fade and inflation pressures fade.

F7 .IP Natl CPI/Ex Fresh Food, Energy YoY Week-in-brief: Troubled Waters

- Week-in-brief: Troubled Waters

 To get a sense of how fragile risk sentiments are, S&P500 gained ~0.8% this week, but S&P futures are trading at -1.2% lower following geopolitical flares on Israel's strike on Iran. Meanwhile, Brent Crude was sent >10% higher (briefly testing $78/bbl) in early Asian session. While Gold's surge of >1.5% on Friday morning may seem modest in comparison, Gold is about 3.5% higher compared to one week ago, revealing a steady climb upwards against the volatile geopolitical backdrop.

 Even as US and China officials met and agreed on a framework, details were lacking. Meanwhile, Trump' threatened to hiking auto tariffs, and issued a second threat of going forth with unilateral tariffs for trading partners to "take it or leave it" as the self-imposed 90-day temporary delay looms.

 It is against this backdrop that we head into a busy week of central bank events, and geopolitical events is unsurprisingly going to feature in policy contemplations.

 FOMC is expected to extend its pause amid opposing inflation and demand risks from heightened trade uncertainty. BOJ will not take any policy action, but markets will be watching for pace of taper, BoJ's views on trade uncertainties and policy tensions on balance sheet vs JGB stability, monetary policy tradeoffs and fiscal-monetary independence.

- tradeoffs and fiscal-monetary independence.
- tradeoffs and fiscal-monetary independence.

 We expect Bank Indonesia to ease amid a stable rupiah since the last meeting, external and domestic growth woes, and managed inflation. Notably, the economic stimulus announced in May on new wage subsidies, electricity tariffs discounts etc. speaks of heightened domestic growth woes (amid reports of higher layoffs) and ought to contain inflationary pressures.

 BSP is set to ease as real rates remain elevated while amid managed inflation pressures, while recent economic indicators point to softer activity.

 We expect CBC to hold rates steady as growth and external demand remains firm. Industrial production and exports growth still resilient while inflation has moved lower in May. Property prices have also shown some signs of stabilisation.

- All in, volatile geopolitical developments would mean that any apparent calmness belie strong undercurrents, and stability would remain elusive.

FOMC: Dilemmas, Dot (Plot) & Dollar

- FOMC: Dilemmas, Dot (Plot) & Dollar

 Amid the tyranny of; i) (mostly self-inflicted) trade/tariff uncertainties; ii) attendant, wider geoeconomic threats and; iii) sharpening fiscal risks, the Fed policy dilemmas are accentuated.

 Consequently, the Fed's pause is universally expected to prolong into the sixth month and the fourth meeting since the last cut (in December 2024).

 What's well known is that the Fed has flagged opposing inflation and demand risks from heightened trade uncertainties, which have inadvertently imposed this policy hiatus.

 Especially as the Fed has few options but to await clarity on tariffs/trade deals, which inherently entail binary risks. Beyond which, gauging whether inflation or demand risks will overwhelm will be the next challenge. What's more, this policy dilemma is accentuated by what appears to be an increasingly precarious fiscal position. Trouble is, this fiscal deterioration simultaneously (on the surface) accentuates inflation risks and tighten financial conditions (by lifting long-end yields higher); thereby sharpening policy trade-offs one way or another. The trade-offs are further worsened by unexpected geopolitical externalities that may impose adverse demand and/or price shocks.

 Against this backdrop the 'Dot Plot' will be pored over for the slightest of twitches. In particular, the current Fed preoccupation latent inflation risks bias the consensus for a mildly more hawkish drift in the Dot Plot'. But perhaps short of a distinct drop in the (median of the) 'Dot Plot' may be assessed for any further upward drift in the projections of longer-term rate. The inference for 'neutral rates", while unlikely to have any imminent outsized impact, could impact forward rate markets.

 Either way, the resultant impact on UST yields is unlikely to be profound as markets digest exceptional conditionality ahead premised on US trade deals are set to be ironed out.

 The USD: What may go unsaid, but not unappreciated, is that even as the Fed proclaims no direct remit for t

- Amid the decline in UST yields, the Greenback ceded ground against all G10 peers as the DXY broke the

 The latter was buoyed by a surge in oil prices with Brent crude soared above US$70/barrel while the former may have enjoyed some lift from resilient domestic growth indicators (robust household consumption and industry production).

 - EUR ascended to test 1.16 levels before retreating after Israel's strike on Iran.

 AUD's underpeformance with much milder gains to hover around 65 cents reflected the adverse spillovers from worries about China's economic performance.

- USTs: FOMC Spillovers
 The UST yield curve bull-flattened amid softer CPI and PPI prints, while jobless claims casted doubts on the resiliency of US labour market. Initial jobless claims were higher-than-expected while continuing claims trended higher.

 - Moreover, haven flows likely aided UST yield's declines amid geo-political tensions in the
- Middle East
- In addition, longer-end yields fell more as fiscal woes were somewhat assuaged by the House passing "DOGE cuts" (even if the bill has yet to be pass by the Senate).

 For the week ahead, we expect spillovers from FOMC to be measured, given the
- conditionality on tariff-induced outcomes on growth and inflation, which are still unclear.

 All in, we expect 2Y UST to trade in the 3.65-4.05% range and 10Y yields to trade in 4.20-4.50% range.

- Tested 143 aided by lower UST yields and haven demand but higher oil prices appears to be restraining speed of JPY rallies.
- 2) EUR: Ascendency halted by late week worries around the Middle East Conflict but buoyancy to be sustained above mid-1.14.
- 3) AUD: Underperformance on the back of US-China deal lacking clarity with further dent from geo-political conflict.
- 4) CNH: Kept steady even as regional peers gains to imply further weakness on NEER basis. Steady, mild gains on weak USD to persist.
- 5) INR: Bond outflows following RBI's jumbo cut unlikely to reverse so quickly. Expected to continue trading around mid-85 levels.
- 6) SGD: A dovish Fed may be a pre-requisite for USD/SGD to break below 1.28 durably. Base case remains that USD/SGD trade above 1.28 levels.
- IDR: Bias towards underperformance on Prabowo's plans to build a $80bn sea wall (over 20 years), which ought to bring fiscal woes back in the spotlight. BI's expected cut would weigh on the IDR as well.
