China Weekly Outlook

Mixed July Price Data

China's July CPI showed muted YoY growth, defying expectations of a 0.1% decline. Non-food prices rose 0.3% YoY, the fastest pace in six months, driven by a 2.8% increase in household appliances and a slower drop in fuel (-9.0%). In contrast, food prices fell 1.6% YoY, accelerating from June's -0.3%, despite adverse weather. Meanwhile, PPI declined more than expected at -3.6% YoY, highlighting persistent deflationary pressure in the industrial sector. Mining and consumer goods prices weakened further, falling 14% and 1.6% YoY, respectively.

These mixed signals are unlikely to prompt a policy rate cut by the PBoC ahead of the FOMC's mid-September decision.

Export growth driven by non-US demand

Export growth in July beat market expectations at 7.2% YoY, driven by strong non-US demand. Shipments to the EU and Africa rose 9.2% and 42.4% YoY, respectively. Exports to ASEAN remained supported, with growth little changed from June (16.6%), while those to the US declined more sharply by 21.7%. By commodity, the growth improvement was led by electronic ICs and steel products, though high-tech product growth slowed to a 10-month low of 4.2%. Imports also outpaced forecasts, rising 4.1% YoY, supported by electronic ICs (13%) and copper ores (26.4%).

Other July data expected this Friday

The strength in exports and material imports bodes well for July's industrial output. For other data releases this Friday, retail sales are expected to rebound to 5.5% YoY, helped by fading distortions from the "618" shopping festival and government subsidies. YTD fixed asset investment is likely to decelerate (2.5% YoY), reflecting weaker momentum in both manufacturing and property sectors.

Additionally, a potential China-US agreement to extend the current trade truce will be a key development to watch this week.

CNH Outlook

Forex – The CNH remained range-bound amid a softer USD backdrop

Rates – Mixed inflation signals are unlikely to prompt the PBoC to cut policy rates

Recap

The CNH remained largely range-bound last week, against the backdrop of softer USD (-1%) driven by expectations that the BoE may be at the end of its rate-cut cycle. The GBP rose 1.3% against the USD after the BoE lowered interest rates to the lowest in over two years over split votes within the committee.

Compared to other Asian currencies, gains in the CNH significantly lagged its peers including PHP (+1.87%), THB (+1.64%), and IDR (1.24%). This divergence once again underscores the PBoC’s preference for a relatively stable currency to facilitate cross-border trade, manage financial risks, and advance yuan internationalization.

Outlook

The upcoming release of US July inflation data could inject fresh volatility into the FX market, potentially disrupting the USD’s easing bullish momentum. Furthermore, uncertainty surrounding the pending China-US agreement to extend their trade truce adds another layer of complexity, though market sentiment remains cautiously optimistic in general.

Despite these headwinds, the CNH is expected to hold its ground, with a likely range between 7.15 and 7.25 over the next couple of weeks. The PBoC’s pivot toward a “moderately loose” monetary stance since late June (dropping references to cutting RRR and interest rates “at an appropriate time”) offers a supportive backdrop. Reinforcing this, the policymaker has reiterated its readiness to deploy counter-cyclical measures to buffer against external shocks. Taken together, these signals suggest the CNH will continue to shadow broader USD movements, but with relatively muted volatility.
