Three Take-Aways

- 1) Trump's escalated Greenland rhetoric and tariff threats triggered a market risk-off response.
- 2) Facing soft consumption, China is layering consumer and investment support, with more policy easing in the pipeline.
- 3) Japan's snap election and proposed food-tax cut revived fiscal fears, triggering a sharp JGB sell-off led by the long end.

MACRO THEME: The Drama

- President Trump has escalated rhetoric around the control over Greenland, stating publicly that the US "has to have it," while amplifying the message, including generated images of himself placing an American flag on Greenland and apparent private messages with European leaders.
- Trump reportedly declined to attend a proposed emergency G7 meeting initiated by French President Emmanuel Macron, reinforcing perceptions of diplomatic friction.
- The episode has been accompanied by explicit tariff threats, with Trump warning of tariffs on eight European allies from February, should negotiations fail, introducing a new source of geopolitical and trade-policy uncertainty.
- European leaders, including France and NATO officials, have pushed back, while the UK reiterated that tariff escalation is not the appropriate channel. Greenland's leadership also rejected U.S. pressure, limiting scope for a near-term resolution.
- From a markets perspective, the developments so far represent headline-driven political noise rather than a shift in baseline trade policy, with no immediate changes to existing agreements.
- Notably, US Treasury Secretary Scott Bessent's remarks in Davos aimed to de-escalate tensions, urging Europe to "sit back and let things play out," while reaffirming US commitments to NATO and discouraging retaliatory trade actions.
- Near-term risks remain contained, but sustained rhetoric could raise risk premia across assets sensitive to transatlantic trade relations, with the key risk being miscalculation or escalation rather than immediate policy action.
- The combination of equity losses, steeper yield curves, and a weaker USD suggests that markets attempted to de-risk in response to escalating geopolitical uncertainty.

Yields (2Y: +1.0bp; 10Y: +7.0bp; 30Y: +8.2bp)Equities (Nasdaq: -2.4%; S&P 500: -2.1%; Dow: -1.8%)*FX (DXY: -0.8%)*China: More Boosts Down the Road

- With consumption ending 2025 on a weak footing, authorities are increasingly leaning toward proactive demand-boosting measures.
- Notably, the December 2025 Central Economic Work Conference elevated "expanding domestic demand" as the top policy priority.

- In support, Beijing has earmarked an initial RMB 62.5bn from ultra-long special sovereign bonds for a consumer trade-in programme.

- Policy support was broadened further, with authorities extending and easing the interest subsidy scheme for personal consumption loans through end-2026, while removing restrictions on eligible consumption categories.

- Key caps were relaxed, including the removal of the RMB 500 per-transaction limit and the RMB 1,000 cumulative cap for sub-RMB 50,000 consumption, while retaining the RMB 3,000 annual cap per borrower per institution.

- Beyond households, China also unveiled a RMB 500bn loan guarantee programme to support private investment, alongside 1.5ppt interest subsidies for SME loans linked to fixed-asset investment, equipment upgrades, and technology transformation.

- NDRC Vice Chairman Wang Changlin noted that authorities will roll out a 2026–2030 domestic demand expansion strategy, reinforcing expectations that additional policy support remains forthcoming.

Japan: Yields Don't Vote

- Backed by strong cabinet approval ratings, Prime Minister Sanae Takaichi announced plans for a snap general election scheduled for 8 February 2026.

- Accompanying the snap election is a proposal to suspend the 8% consumption tax on food products for two years, which the government estimates would reduce annual tax revenue by around ¥5 trillion—roughly 4% of total 2025 tax receipts.

- While Takaichi has pledged not to issue new debt to finance the food tax suspension, markets appear unconvinced.

- Concerns have risen that aggressive fiscal stimulus and tax cuts could further complicate efforts to stabilize Japan's already elevated public debt burden, particularly as interest rates normalize, reigniting elements of the "sell-Japan" narrative.

- These fiscal concerns triggered a sharp repricing in JGBs, with investors demanding higher term premia to compensate for larger deficits and heightened political risk.

- The 10-year JGB yield surged above 2.2%, the highest level in roughly 27 years, while the sell-off was most pronounced at the ultra-long end, where 30- and 40-year yields jumped by more than 25bp in a single session.

- Some market participants have flagged the risk of potential BoJ market operations if the sell-off intensifies, but this remains a tail risk rather than the base case.

- In contrast, the JPY proved relatively resilient despite the bond sell-off, amid media reports that the BoJ has grown increasingly concerned that excessive yen weakness could exacerbate inflationary pressures.

- As a result, rate-hike expectations have firmed, with markets bringing forward expectations of a 25bp hike to June from July.
