Three Take-Aways

- 1) Renewed supply shocks and stronger data pushed Fed rate cut expectations lower.
- 2) IEA reserves are insufficient against Iran's supply shock, leaving oil elevated and inflation-linked yield risks rising.
- 3) HKD's weakness may fade as quarter-end liquidity needs reduce the appeal of HKD-USD carry trades.

MACRO THEME: Rate-Cut Hopes Fade

- Risk appetite softened further as elevated energy prices and renewed trade frictions—with the U.S. launching a new Section 301 investigation into multiple major trading partners—reinforced a cautious market tone.

- The IEA's record 400-million-barrel reserve release failed to reassure markets, with geopolitical headlines overshadowing policy action.

- Reports that Iran has laid mines in the Strait of Hormuz and statements from Iranian leadership insisting the waterway should remain closed heightened concerns over the scale of supply disruption and persistent shipping bottlenecks. Oil accordingly extended its recent surge.

- Rate-cut expectations continued to drift lower, as the combination of supply-driven inflation risk and firmer macro data tempered dovish positioning. With Initial Jobless Claims and Housing Starts surprising to the upside, markets now price fewer than one 25bp Fed cut by end-2026—down sharply from more than two cuts expected before the war began, reflecting a significant recalibration in the policy outlook in response to the ongoing supply shock.

When 400 Million Barrels Isn't Enough

- Despite a record 400 million barrels of coordinated strategic petroleum reserves (SPR) release committed, the IEA may not be able to meaningfully subdue oil prices.

- For one, the sheet scale of oil flow disrupted by Iran - led by the Straits of Hormuz blockade - far overwhelms the IEA's depth of reserves to credibly dampen.

- For comparison, the estimated 14MBpD disrupted (accounting for 6MBpD that Saudi can divert via pipelines) is 7 times the estimated effective disruption from Russia.

- Whereas the 400 million barrels of coordinated SPR release is merely two-thirds more released (by the US and IEA) in 2022.

- In addition, the "drip rate" of SPR release has not crossed 2MBpD in 2022, denting a supply deluge that immediately hits markets.

- Furthermore, this "drip" constraint is exacerbated by IEA reserves - other than Japan's - being 3-6 weeks away from the Res Sea, which compounds the coincident shipping crisis that significantly adds to oil's cost.

- Oil Price Risks: The upshot is, in the absence of a quick de-escalation of the Iran war, oil could surge (and stay) above $100, defying the SPR reserves.

- Yield Spillover: If oil is sustained above $100, it may incite a climb in 5y5y inflation swaps to 2.5-2.8%, which could in turn spill-over to lift 10Y UST yields to 4.5-4.8%.

Iran War: A Long Road to Peace Talks

- Prospects for meaningful US-Iran peace negotiations remain extremely limited, despite occasional signals of conditional openness.

- US President Trump reinforced this stance stating that preventing Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons is "far more important" than stabilizing oil prices, underscoring focus on strategic containment rather than de-escalation.

- Iran continues to set terms the US is unlikely to accept. President Masoud Pezeshkian reiterated three prerequisites for ending the war: recognition of Iran's "legitimate rights," payment of reparations, and firm international guarantees against future aggression.

- These conditions remain extremely difficult—if not impossible—to reconcile with current US policy priorities, particularly given Washington's emphasis on preventing a nuclear-armed Iran.

- With both sides hardening their positions, and with the conflict increasingly spilling across the Gulf, there is no credible pathway to near-term negotiations. Iran's leadership has simultaneously signaled its intention to keep the Strait of Hormuz closed as leverage, further underscoring the entrenched nature of the conflict.

- Markets should expect geopolitical risk premiums to persist until a credible diplomatic opening emerges.

Hong Kong: HKD Softness Meets Seasonal Risk

- The HKD continues to exhibit characteristics of a funding currency, with HIBOR sitting unusually low relative to US front-end rates.

- The widened SOFR-HIBOR differential has kept the incentive structure firmly in favour of borrowing HKD to invest in higher-yielding USD assets. This rate gap has been the key driver anchoring USD/HKD toward the weak side of the trading band, even in the absence of meaningful capital outflows or macro deterioration.

- However, the durability of this setup will be tested as March progresses. Quarter-end is traditionally associated with an upswing in HKD funding demand as banks manage balance sheets, and March is also a period when dividend-related flows begin to surface.

- These seasonal dynamics can push short-tenor HIBOR higher relatively quickly, even if the impact proves temporary. However, the risk balance is shifting: once seasonal liquidity demand builds, HKD spot could start to firm modestly toward 7.80, as the carry-trade incentive diminishes and funding conditions tighten at the margin.
