

Three Take-Aways

1) US equities were mixed as concerns over AI financing sustainability weighed on sentiment, with Nvidia's growing role in funding customers' investments raising questions about the durability of AI-driven demand.

2) Geopolitical risks have eased at the margin, with signs of de-escalation in the Middle East and a US-China tariff ceiling providing greater near-term policy clarity, though both truces remain fragile.

3) Germany's improving business sentiment supports a gradual recovery narrative and reinforces the ECB's tightening bias, but higher rates risk constraining an economy that has yet to show a convincing rebound.

MACRO THEME: AI Financing Strain

- US equities were mixed overnight with S&P500 flat while Nasdaq closed lower as chip weakness offset broader resilience.

- Reports of Nvidia pursuing AI deals worth over US$750bn, including a partnership with SK Group that CEO Jensen Huang said could generate "half a trillion dollars" of business between the firms, weighed on chip stocks.

- The other deals making up the headline figure includes i) US$1b investment in Naver Corp's AI data centre, ii) US$5b commitment to Ilya Sutskever's Safe Superintelligence, iii) US$250b of funding guarantees for OpenAI's lease of a SoftBank-developed data centre in Ohio and iv) financing for US$350b of OpenAI's Nvidia chip purchases for the facility.

- On characterisation of the deals as 'circular', Huang argued the deals account for only a small share of customers' funding needs, but investors remain concerned that Nvidia's customer financing arrangements may distort demand signals and amplify downside risks.

China's Semiconductor Push Gains Momentum

- Compounding the unease, ASML fell 5.8% after reports that a Chinese state-backed firm has begun producing deep ultraviolet (DUV) lithography machines. While the development came sooner than expected, the technology still requires further testing before mass production, leaving ASML's position largely intact.

- ASML also retains a lead in extreme ultraviolet (EUV) lithography that is essential for manufacturing the most advanced chips.

- In another sign of China's growing presence in the semiconductor industry, Chinese memory-chip maker CXMT surged over 400% on its market debut, underscoring China's ambitions to challenge global incumbents such as Samsung, SK Hynix and Micron.

- As China advances across the semiconductor chain, intensifying US-China competition and elevated capex spending could eventually raise concerns around overcapacity and a future industry shakeout.

Middle East Tensions Ease, But Risks Persist

- Meanwhile on the US-Iran conflict, Trump said there's a "good chance" of a deal with Iran, although he warned hostilities could resume if negotiations fail, underscoring the fragility of diplomacy.

- The US and Iran have largely refrained from direct attacks for a third consecutive day, but uncertainty remains around access to the Strait of Hormuz, keeping shipping activity subdued.

- Iranian and Omani officials are reportedly working on plans to reopen the strait's central shipping lane, including potential de-mining efforts, with progress possible in the coming days.

- Easing concerns over supply disruptions helped push Brent crude below US$90/bbl, despite continued Houthi drone attacks on Saudi energy infrastructure. While tensions have moderated, the truce remains fragile and energy markets are likely to stay sensitive to further developments.

US-China: Tariff Ceiling Offer Near-Term Clarity

- China said US has pledged to cap tariffs on Chinese goods at 20%. With the current replacement tariff being 12.5% following forced-labour investigations, this suggests only 7.5%-pt of additional tariff headroom.

- With the one-year US-China tariff truce set to expire in November unless extended, the disclosure of a tariff ceiling provides greater near-term policy clarity and helps reduce the risk of a significant escalation in trade tensions.

- That said, the truce remains fragile, with uncertainty persisting over whether both sides can reach a longer-term agreement beyond November.

Germany's Sentiment Improves, Recovery Still Tentative

- Germany's July ifo Business Climate index beat expectations, driven mostly by improved expectations rather than current conditions, pointing to stabilisation rather than a full recovery.

- The improvement was led by manufacturing, where easing supply constraints and firmer demand suggest conditions are bottoming out from a weak base. Notably, business confidence improved despite tensions in the Middle East, suggesting firms are increasingly looking through geopolitical risks and higher energy prices.

- That said, assessments of current business conditions softened across both manufacturing and services, indicating subdued near-term activity. Overall, the data supports a gradual recovery outlook, though evidence of a sustained rebound remains limited.

- The stronger sentiment data coincided with hawkish remarks from ECB's Kazimir, who said at least one more rate hike may be needed to contain inflation risks. With oil prices elevated and a September hike increasingly priced by markets, the ECB appears more likely to validate than challenge expectations for further tightening.

- Firmer sentiment and hawkish ECB tone could backstop the EUR, though additional rate hikes risk slowing the nascent recovery as firms remain cautious about current conditions.
