

Three Take-Aways

1) US data point to a noisy GDP miss rather than a growth scare, while cooler PCE inflation reduces near-term hike risk but still leaves inflation too high for a Fed dovish pivot.

2) US equities rebounded on AI earnings optimism led by Microsoft.

3) Suspected MoF intervention looks aimed at cushioning JPY ahead of an expected BoJ hold and breaking the "Sell Japan" loop.

MACRO THEME: Noisy GDP Miss, But No Dovish Pivot Yet

- US Q2 GDP missed expectations, rising at an annualized 1.5% QoQ versus consensus of 2.0%, and slowing from 2.1% in Q1.

- However, the headline weakness was largely driven by trade distortions, as a surge in imports, partly linked to AI-related semiconductor demand, weighed on net exports. Underlying domestic demand was much firmer. Personal consumption rebounded sharply to an annualized 3.2% QoQ from 0.5% in Q1, while nonresidential fixed investment also contributed positively. As such, the GDP miss likely overstates the extent of the economic slowdown.

- The inflation data were more constructive. June headline PCE inflation printed -0.1% MoM and +3.7% YoY, while core PCE inflation came in at +3.3% YoY. Both were in line with expectations and slowed from previous readings. More importantly, PCE supercore services inflation eased to just +0.1% MoM, down from +0.5% in May, suggesting that underlying services inflation is cooling.

- Overall, the data mix reduces the urgency of imminent Fed hikes, but falls short of justifying a dovish pivot, with inflation still well above the Fed's 2% target.

AI Earnings Rescue Risk Sentiment

- US equities staged a sharp rebound overnight, led by mega-cap tech and semiconductors. The catalyst was Microsoft, which jumped over 15% after stronger-than-expected Azure growth reassured investors that AI capex is beginning to translate into revenue, sparking a broader rally across AI-linked chip names.

- Still, the rally had clear caveats. Meta fell after disappointing earnings and higher AI spending guidance, while long-end Treasury yields stayed elevated, keeping valuation sensitivity alive.

- Overall, the rally looks more like an earnings-led relief bounce than a clean macro re-risking, with the market still highly dependent on big tech delivery and the rate backdrop.

MoF Steps In Before the BoJ

- The sharp JPY rally overnight, with USD/JPY plunging from near 164 to a low of 157.98, looks like a clear signal of MoF intervention ahead of today's BoJ meeting.

- The timing suggests authorities are trying to pre-empt renewed JPY selling if the BoJ delivers the expected hold.

- More importantly, the objective appears to be strategically aimed at decoupling JPY stability from BoJ rate decisions and breaking the adverse "Sell Japan" loop of a weaker JPY and higher JGB yields.

- Still, this remains an aspiration rather than an accomplished reset, with JPY shorts likely to return if US yields and geopolitical risks remain elevated.

Taiwan Q2 GDP Preview: Momentum Holds

- The semiconductor and AI-capex upcycle looks set to keep Taiwan's Q2 GDP at double-digit growth at around 10% YoY, a moderation from Q1's 14.5%.

- While net exports should remain the main growth engine in Q2, their contribution is likely to moderate as imports (+46.9% YoY) grew marginally faster than exports (+45.8% YoY). That said, import of capital goods (+11.7%-pt) contributed significantly to the surge in imports, pointing to robust investment demand and sustained AI-related capex.

- Domestic demand also appears resilient. Wholesale trade remained buoyant, while retail trade and food & beverage services accelerated YoY on average over April-May YoY, suggesting that private consumption continued to be supportive.

- A robust growth outturn, coupled with inflation persistently remaining above historical norms would provide CBC with confidence for a 12.5bp rate calibration.

- Strong fundamentals and the prospect of a rate hike should provide a modest backstop for the TWD, which has recently faced pressure amid foreign portfolio outflows and investments into US.

BoJ Watch: Flex, Not (Futile) Fight

- At the July policy meeting, the BoJ is likely to indulge in more hawkish flex, but we argue it may refrain from hikes that risk being a futile fight against chronic JPY pressures.

- Furthermore, hawks could argue that the nefarious adverse loop between JPY weakness and intensifying imported inflation pressures warrant hikes to nip in the bud.

- But while understandable, that is misguided as the BoJ will likely struggle to adequately impress with rate hikes – certainly not sufficiently to snap pressures from "carry" funding position.

- Especially as adverse energy, shipping and insurance shocks further underpin JPY from a flows and C/A shifts. And so, hastily squandering (relatively limited) capacity for further hikes comes across as a myopic move – with short-lived JPY supported benefits.

- Whereas what's preferable sustained hawkish flex complemented by credible, MoF intervention threats (in coordination with Fed/US Treasury). Unfortunately, for the BoJ, it remains the case that (bearish) JPY is a BoJ problem with a (dovish) Fed solution.
