Three Take-Aways

1) Strong Nvidia earnings reinforced confidence in the AI cycle, but margin pressures, talent competition and capital constraints highlight emerging limits to the rally.

2) Meanwhile, hawkish Fed speak alongside firm labour market data reinforces a higher bar for rate cuts, with Jackson Hole the key test of whether Chair Warsh can restore policy credibility without further unsettling bond markets.

3) Persistent Hormuz uncertainty keeps oil risk premium elevated, reinforcing BSP's concerns over inflation and currency stability.

MACRO THEME: AI Rally Amid Emerging Constraints

- US equities closed higher overnight, driven by a rally in tech stocks after Nvidia guided FY2028 revenue growth of ~70%, well above consensus estimates of 45%.

- Additionally, Nvidia's stronger-than-expected 2Q data centre results reinforced the view that AI demand remains robust, alleviating concerns that growth is being artificially supported by customer financing arrangements. That said, it warned margins are likely to narrow as rising memory costs weigh on profitability.

- Bucking the trend, Alphabet underperformed amid concerns that delays to its flagship AI model and continued employee departures are eroding its competitive position.

- While Nvidia's results reinforced optimism on the AI cycle, growing pressures on margins and intensifying competition for both capital and talent highlight growing constraints.

Hawkish Fed speak Supported by Firm Labour Data

- Several Fed officials struck a hawkish tone overnight, arguing that current policy settings may not be sufficiently restrictive, ahead of Chair Kevin Warsh's keynote speech tonight.

- Cleveland Fed President Beth Hammack who dissented last month, said inflation could end the year near 3% and argued that policy restraint remains necessary. Kansas City Fed President Jeff Schmid also suggested policy may be accommodative at the short end and said he would have preferred a rate hike at the previous meeting. In contrast, Boston Fed President Susan Collins maintained that policy remains mildly restrictive but said further disinflation would be needed to justify continued pauses. Notably, neither Schmid nor Collins are voting FOMC members this year.

- Supporting the hawkish narrative, initial jobless claims fell to 203k, near historically low levels. Together with persistent inflation concerns, this reinforces a higher bar for Fed rate cuts, keeping front-end UST yields elevated.

Hormuz Standoff Continues

- Oil prices rebounded, with Brent crude approaching US$90/barrel on reports that the Trump administration has no interest in returning to the terms of its June MoU with Iran.

- Although Iran announced an agreement with Oman on maritime boundaries and revenue sharing last night, it cautioned reopening Hormuz would require broader progress, likely referring to the US naval blockade. Meanwhile, US allies remain skeptical that all mines have been cleared despite President Trump's claims.

- Even so, oil remains lower for the week as crude flows through Hormuz is reported to have gradually recovered to around 6-8mbpd (from 20mbpd pre-conflict). Gulf producers have increasingly relied on shuttle operations that transfer cargoes beyond the Persian Gulf to tankers reluctant to transit the strait. Nevertheless, the lack of a durable resolution continues to support an elevated risk premium and should keep oil prices well supported in the near term.

BSP: Pre-emptive Move, Not Disregard

- Yesterday, BSP raised its policy rate by 25bp, in line with market consensus. Governor Remolona characterised the move as a pre-emptive response to upside inflation risks from El Nino and impending wage hikes, as core inflation remained sticky.

- With oil prices up ~12% since the previous meeting compounding onto PHP depreciation of ~2%, the upside risks to inflation and macro stability are certainly evident even though not outrightly overwhelming growth concerns. Point being, BSP also considered holding rates, likely due to the dismal Q2 GDP print but judged that a pause would have done little to support growth.

- While the main drag on growth has been the slowdown in public infrastructure spending, weak household consumption also warrants close monitoring. The rate hike provided only temporary reprieve to the PHP, which initially pared losses following the decision before reversing those gains. The PHP is likely to remain under pressure ahead of Jackson Hole as oil prices and UST yields climbed higher.

Fed Take: Digging Out of a (Jackson) Hole

- Surging long-end yields driven by mounting monetary policy doubts and intensifying fiscal woes set the stage for a daunting Jackson Hole address for Warsh. Notably, the Fed Chair is confronted with the tall order of digging (himself/the Fed) out of a (credibility) hole.

- An already difficult task made harder by Warsh's preference for brevity and aversion to forward guidance – both of which conspire to foment doubt. Notably, any allusion to surging yields tightening financial conditions from surging yields, while factually accurate, risks provoking bond vigilantes.

- The hope is that the (w)hole (credibility-boosting effect) of Warsh's address is greater than the sum of its (hawkish) parts. That said, Warsh is likely to disappoint on hawkish expectations, remaining non-committal on a Sep (FOMC) hike, to maximize optionality.

o UST Yields: Consequently, this is likely to end up with a propensity for a bearish (long-end)-bullish (front-end) dynamic.

o USD: Alongside a slightly softer USD, albeit uneven so as higher-beta AXJ may defer to any lift in UST yields instead.
