

China Weekly Outlook

A Framework instead of A Deal

The absence of a major deal following the Trump-Xi summit was broadly in line with market expectations. However, the meeting helped solidify a framework for continued US-China engagement, with two more meetings potentially taking place in November and December in Shenzhen and Miami, respectively. Both sides agreed to build a “constructive relationship of strategic stability based on respect, fairness and reciprocity.” In support of this objective, they endorsed the establishment of a Board of Trade and a Board of Investment, providing an institutionalized mechanism for managing future disputes. This would help contain tail risks arising from persistent bilateral competition. The planned launch of a Super Intelligence Dialogue by November could also help reduce the risk of accidental escalation caused by AI incidents, particularly as both parties continue to pursue all-out AI development.

A More Supportive Tone by the PBoC

On the domestic front, the PBoC adopted a somewhat more supportive tone at its Q3 monetary policy meeting last Thursday, placing greater emphasis on near-term countercyclical support. The removal of the reference to “cross-cyclical” adjustment, together with a new pledge to adjust monetary policy tools as appropriate, suggests greater readiness to respond to weak demand and subdued price pressures. However, the focus on keeping aggregate financing costs low, rather than lowering them further, indicates that broad-based easing is not yet the preferred option. Any additional support is therefore more likely to come through targeted liquidity injections aimed at boosting investment in technology and infrastructure. Meanwhile, the warning against herd behaviour in the foreign exchange market points to growing concern that expectations of renminbi appreciation could become self-reinforcing.

A Mixed Manufacturing Picture

Turning to September manufacturing activity, high-frequency indicators paint a mixed picture. PTA production picked up notably in September (Fig. 2), helped by improved supply of oil derivatives. Demand for copper and aluminium remained resilient, with prices continuing to edge higher (Fig. 15). By contrast, crude steel production slowed markedly (Fig. 3). The operating rate of semi-steel tyre factories, an important gauge of auto production, has also weakened in recent weeks (Fig. 4), weighed by softer vehicle sales. Outward shipping indicators were also mixed: the freight rate index for European routes fell to a three-month low, while indices for other routes climbed higher (Fig. 5). On balance, supported by favourable seasonality, we expect China’s official manufacturing PMI to return to expansionary territory in September, at 50.1.

Recap

The offshore renminbi (CNH) experienced a volatile session last week. It initially strengthened against the US dollar, with USD/CNH falling to 6.691 as the PBoC continued to set the daily fixing lower. However, the pair subsequently reversed course and broke above 6.725, following the absence of a major deal at the Trump-Xi summit and the PBoC's warning against excessive one-way moves in the renminbi.

The PBoC guided the daily fixing stronger last week in general. On Monday, the reference rate fell below 6.74 for the first time since 2023 and stood just 0.4% above the level implied by the CFETS model, narrowing further from an average deviation of 0.7% in the previous week. The gap between USD/CNH and the daily fixing also narrowed notably, suggesting easing market pressure for the CNH to appreciate further.

Over the week, the CNH depreciated by 0.4% against the dollar, making it the region's second-worst performer after the Indonesian rupiah. The IDR weakened by 0.8%, as pressure from higher oil prices and lower SRBI yields outweighed the limited support provided by Bank Indonesia. By contrast, the Korean won led regional gains, appreciating by 2.1% amid strong dollar selling by exporters.

Outlook

Attention is likely to shift towards economic fundamentals this week, including China's official and RatingDog PMIs, as well as US core PCE inflation and nonfarm payrolls. CNH volatility may remain elevated, with the currency lacking a clear direction later in the week as the onshore market closes for the National Day holiday from Thursday.

Further ahead, we maintain our year-end USD/CNH forecast at 6.65, as the result of the renminbi's appreciation momentum and elevated US treasury yields. A consensus has emerged among market participants and Fed officials that at least one more Fed rate increase may be required to contain US inflation expectations arising from geopolitical energy shocks.
