

Three Take-Aways

1) Despite Trump's efforts to downplay the risk of a near-term conflict with Iran, escalating attacks across the Gulf and Red Sea regions kept geopolitical tensions elevated and supported rising oil prices.

2) A reassessment of AI monetization expectations triggered a sharp sell-off in semiconductor and technology stocks, weighing on US equities and driving safe-haven demand for Treasuries.

3) In China, holiday travel held up well, while investment headwinds appear to be moderating. However, soft credit creation remains a key constraint.

MACRO THEME: Persistent Gulf Tension

- President Trump dismissed reports that the US was preparing military strikes against Iran ahead of the midterm elections, citing constructive discussions between the two countries.

- His comments followed media reports that the US military had drafted a few options for a three-day strike campaign.

- Despite this assurance, tensions in the region remain escalated.

- Iran has intensified attacks on oil tankers since September, helping keep Brent crude above $100/bbl, with prices rising a further 3.9% overnight.

- Several heavy explosions were reported in the Strait of Hormuz late Thursday after sea mines struck "violating" tankers attempting to transit the southern shipping lane.

- Separately, a tanker was hit by projectiles off the coast of Qatar, marking a rare attack deep inside the Persian Gulf.

- Iran-backed Houthi forces also launched strikes on two airports in Saudi Arabia, underscoring the growing regional spillover from renewed fighting in Yemen.

AI Reality Check

- In capital markets, a sharp sell-off in semiconductor and AI-related stocks weighed on US equities and triggered a rally in Treasuries.

- The move was sparked by reports that OpenAI's annualized revenue reached nearly $50bn as of end-September, well below the roughly $70bn figure that had been widely circulated in recent months.

- The gap appears to reflect differing accounting methodologies adopted by AI companies and listed companies, with the higher estimates by AI ones reportedly including revenue generated through cloud partners.

- Investors interpreted the lower figure as a sign that AI monetization may be progressing more slowly than previously expected, sending the Philadelphia Semiconductor Index down 3.4%. The Nasdaq 100 fell 1.4%, its largest one-day decline in seven weeks.

Reinforced Hawks

- Two senior Federal Reserve officials reinforced a hawkish policy stance, with St. Louis Fed President Alberto Musalem and Governor

Christopher Waller both signaling that additional rate hikes remain likely to bring inflation back to 2%, though Waller noted flexibility on the timing of consecutive moves.

- Labor market data offered little relief for the dovish camp, as initial jobless claims fell for a fourth straight week to 197,000, the lowest since July, underscoring continued tightness in employment conditions.

- Meanwhile, the housing sector faces mounting strain as the 30-year fixed mortgage rate climbed to 7.4%, its highest since November 2023.

China: A Warmer Autumn

- China's National Day holiday indicators point to broadly resilient travel activity and modest growth in tourism-related consumption.

- At the national level, cross-regional passenger movements rose just 0.7% YoY to 2.14bn.

- Among major destinations, Shanghai reported a 3.5% YoY increase in tourism-related transactions, while Yunnan recorded growth of 4.8% in visitor arrivals and 4.5% in tourism revenue.

- Overall, the preliminary data suggest that tourism demand remained relatively well supported. However, a decisive improvement in consumer sentiment has yet to emerge, with the ongoing property-related wealth effect and uncertain employment prospects continuing to constrain a broader recovery in discretionary spending.

Trimmed Sectoral Divergence

- Similarly, the improvement in September's official manufacturing PMI was driven primarily by consumer goods, where the PMI climbed to 50.7, a new high since April.

- Meanwhile, PMIs for high-tech and equipment manufacturing remained comfortably above the 50 threshold, though both eased from previously elevated levels.

- By firm size, the headline improvement was supported by less negative sentiment among medium- and small-sized manufacturers.

Less Investment Drag?

- Beyond consumption, incoming data suggest that investment activity has begun to show tentative signs of stabilization.

- Following the July Politburo meeting, China's construction PMI returned to expansionary territory for the first time in more than a year, while both rebar and cement prices have continued to firm.

- Together, these indicators point to improving construction activity and suggest that the drag from fixed asset investment may have started to ease in September.

- Nevertheless, weak credit creation remains a concern, especially given the higher 1-year and 3-year government bond yields over the past several weeks.
