text by Rick Gerardus Mimic muscles and data streams algorithmically orchestrated infrastructures of mediation inscribe themselves onto the shopkeeper, the trash, the distant famine. Children are swarming the subway station, mingling with today's merchandise. A blanket of toxic fumes hangs over the streets, obscuring the view to the dwellings and relics that punctuate the hills all around. The inclines beyond the square are dotted by caves, once inhabited by people, who turned themselves into animals. Near an alcove, semicircular like the apse of a cathedral, I sit down on a sticky bench. I am at Kotti. Artist Yashar Shirdel has built a space with me. One that existed in an unfulfilled past, one that cannot be, one that is gone now that we name it. The crowd around us lingers, as though carved from flesh. I am certain, I am a dog, a slave to children once imagined.

text The work is a site-specific installation responding to the SANAA Building as a near-perfect cubic architecture, reminding the institutional “white cube.” The project explores the deconstruction of this spatial and conceptual framework through the idea of unfolding a cube. Six clay surfaces were created as an unfolded cube form. The material’s drying process was carefully controlled with plastic foil, emphasizing transformation over time and the interaction between material and exhibition space. The work also reflects on the building’s glass façade, focusing on its fragility and transparency within a concrete structure. A found wooden element was placed in contact with the glass as a gesture of unfolding and revealing the invisible spatial relations.

text A contribution to a group exhibition conceived around the museum's own history of underrepresentation. Research into the museum's exhibition records from recent decades revealed a significant gap between its stated commitment to visibility and its actual programming. The work responds to this contradiction – the institution updating its image through an exhibition about underrepresented artists while bypassing accountability for its own recent history. An animation of a small elephant appears and disappears within the museum space: present, then fading, then returning. The gesture is simple – making the elephant in the room physically visible, placing it inside the institution that houses it.

text „TOTTHE'T TOTTATO“ examines the contemporary post-photographic condition between photography and sculpture. It explores the potential of a photogrammetric 3D scan of a simple tomato stem as an objet trouvé – transformed to a solid porcelain sculpture, evoking an imaginative object.

speculative plant

text The work responds to the grounds of Sunnybrook Art Center in Leipzig – a former landfill on the site of a lignite mining area. Research into the site's geological prehistory led to a focus on the Tertiary period and the conditions under which coal forms: millions of years of flooding, growth, and organic accumulation compressed into matter. Based on fossil data and 3D scans of plant growth on the landfill, a fictional plant species was modelled, 3D-printed, cast and fired in porcelain – a material that itself comes from the earth. The choice enacts the work's central proposition: the transformation of an extinct form into solid, present matter.

text The sculpture is one example among many that documents experiments in printing modeled and scanned 3D objects with a ceramic printer. These experiments primarily examined the analog and digital processes of transformation from photogrammetric scans and models into plastic(PLA), ceramic, and metal materials.

text The Virtual Reality piece „As a Dealer of the sun, I am happy“ was created in the dynamic context of the exhibition format and alliance The Cities Wrapped Around Our Bodies (TCWAOB), in collaboration with Möglichkeitsraum Kotti Kollektiv. The digitization of Kottbusser Tor (a square in Berlin) was used as a triggering landscape to prototype interventions and explore the local social and spatial fabric, alongside the entanglement of physical and digital space. Conceived by Rick Gerardus, this format was offered to Shirdel as the lead game engine/mixed media artist and as a basis for developing an independent work. Gerardus and Shirdel collaborated closely, with Shirdel responsible for realizing the contributions of other artists (including Tracey Snelling, Nastio Mosquito, Petja Ivanova) while also creating an overarching scenario, As a dealer of the sun, I am happy, which stands as an autonomous artistic work.

text Tan (Persian for body / flesh / person) is a collaborative project that explores how virtual phenomena, algorithmically mediated cultures through images become actual and embodied.

Five figures enter the physical space—drawn towards the projection, as they explore their immediate surroundings.

Is it possible to resist by dismantling the face and reclaiming the flesh, the meat?
