Many can even say with certainty whether this person is present. But to give this concept a precise definition, few are capable. No wonder, even modern sociological scientists have not been able to do this until very recently. However, after several years of research, a more or less precise definition of the term "aristocratic appearance" was nevertheless highlighted. Of course, there are still disagreements and inaccuracies in it, but this is only a matter of time. And now all those interested can satisfy their curiosity and find out what kind of appearance it is - the appearance of an aristocrat? Myths about nobles At once it is necessary to make a reservation that not all people of noble origin have a noble appearance. On the contrary - often the most that neither are the great and "noble" representatives of the human race, the appearance is the most ordinary, often even with some ugliness. The reason for this - the care of the so-called "purity of blood," because of which a couple of the bridegroom or bride could be selected for reasons of not health and especially appearance, and fame of the genus. Sometimes there were related marriages, which, of course, had a negative impact on the children born in them. Aristocratic appearance: signs At present, nobility and refinement can be found in a variety of people. The main signs of aristocratic appearance are the following: Long face with a high, straight forehead, thin nose - perfectly even or with a slight hump; Sufficiently large eyes, a thin line of eyebrows, a narrow chin; Hair - any color, but always healthy, well-groomed, shiny, eyelashes and eyebrows - dark, ideally - black; Elegant body, creating the impression of refinement, even in the case of completeness; Long arms and legs, brushes and feet are miniature, with thin fingers, nails - almond-shaped; Very light thin skin, pale or with a pinkish tint, necessarily clean and smooth; The correct proportions of the face and body. Behavior But, of course, aristocratic appearance is created not only by the above mentioned signs, but also by the manner to keep oneself. True nobility is attached only to a straight posture, a proudly raised head, a direct look, graceful movements and politeness. "Moon features" Like any other desire for the better, aristocracy had its shortcomings. So, for quite a long time the "lunar features" were extremely popular - fullness, combined with huge pale eyes, too thin white skin, rounded face. But, contrary to the opinion of the majority, it was not a breakthrough and not the result of carefully calculated marriages, but a genetic defect that resulted from sexual relations between close relatives. Bastards Surprisingly, some people even in those old days understood that excessive pallor, weakness and obvious inability to work physically are not good, and they wanted to bring "fresh" blood into their genus by entering into intimate contact with people of "lower" origin. Thus appeared bastards - illegitimate children of the nobility, whose aristocratic appearance put many at a dead end. Well, if a well-known parent recognized such descendants, then they qualitatively improved their kind. The idea of an aristocracy has been established for many centuries and in many countries around the world. After so many generations of aristocrats, particularly those who lived infamous or notable lives, it's not surprising that the idea of an aristocratic character has become part of mass culture. While the image of an aristocrat may vary from person to person, and may also be heavily influenced by background, there are some stereotypical traits that have become established to represent this intriguing social group. One of these is the idea of aristocratic beauty. But what exactly is this kind of beauty, and is it something only those born into noble lineage can attain? What Is Aristocratic Beauty? There are two kinds of aristocratic beauty. The first kind can be explained using some of the facial features and popular aesthetics that have been prevalent in the highest echelons of society throughout the centuries. Empress Joséphine Bonaparte - Antoine-Jean Gros, Public domain, via Wikimedia Commons These include features such as: • A Long Thin Nose. The aristocracy has long been associated with a particular type of nose, one that has come to represent both noble beauty and also strength of character. This type of nose was common among many aristocratic families, which is perhaps what led to this facial feature becoming a hallmark of the noble classes. • A Defined Jawline And Chin. The famous names of the aristocracy have traditionally been represented in fine art paintings that show the men in military uniform and the ladies in exquisite dresses. A perfect complement to these costumes and settings was a strong chin for the males and a beautifully defined jawline for the women and girls. This is perhaps why this kind of profile ultimately became a feature associated with aristocratic beauty. • An Oval-shaped Face. In terms of classical beauty, symmetry and proportion play an important part of the overall appeal of a face. One of the most admired face shapes is that of an oval, which is regarded as more pleasing than an overtly round or square-shaped face. This face shape has thus become an ideal to attain or enhance, something that the aristocratic classes would have had the time and the means to pursue. • Lustrous Hair. In some cultures, beautiful hair could be a representation of good health and affluence. The noble classes would go to great lengths to ensure their hair looked its best, not only with good maintenance (something the working classes had less time for) but also with lavish decorations and jewels to show off their locks as impressively as possible. The role of hair as a status symbol can be seen in the expensive and extravagant wigs favoured by royals and aristocrats through the ages. • A Proud Stature. Aristocratic beauty is about more than facial features, it also extends to the way a person holds themselves, their stance, and the position of their head. It's well known that stature is a good reflection of self-esteem and self-confidence, and aristocrats were raised to believe in their superiority and value - something that came to be embodied in the stature of the noble classes. • An Unhurried Walk. Beyond facial features and body positioning, aristocratic beauty can be witnessed in the way a person moves. Royals and nobles were trained from an early age to be dignified at all times, so rushing and dashing is not a feature of aristocratic behaviour. As such, an unhurried walk and graceful cadence have come to signify a noble character and represent a type of aristocratic beauty. These traits and characteristics have become associated with the finest aristocratic aesthetics, based on many centuries of evolution within this esteemed noble class. These features were deemed to be the epitome of aristocratic beauty, and as such, portrait painters would be keen to highlight or enhance such traits in a bid to please and honour their patrons. This practice of creating portraiture that reflects the desirable traits further entrenched the idea that these facial and physical appearances were a core feature of aristocratic excellence.
