The following year, she won her first official Grand Slam title at the US Open, earning $750,000 in prizemoney. She also won the Grand Slam Cup, which earned her $900,000. In total, she earned $2.55 million for the year. From 2000 to 2005, Williams typically earned anywhere between $900,000 and $3.66 million annually. She earned the latter figure in 2002 when she won all three of the Grand Slam tournaments she competed in. This included $818,000 for winning the US Open, $632,000 for winning Wimbledon, and $679,000 for winning the French Open. Williams took a short break in 2006, earning just $131,705. However, she returned in 2007 and picked up right where she left off. From 2009 to 2016, Serena was at the peak of her career, earning between $6.8 million and $12.1 million annually in prize money. Her two most successful years were 2013 and 2015, during which she earned $12.1 million and $10.6 million, respectively. In 2013, she won eight singles tournaments, including the WTA Championships, which paid out $2.15 million in prize money. She also had two other seven-figure payday: $3.55 million for winning the US Open and $1.87 million for winning the French Open. Total Prize Money Throughout her professional tennis career, Serena Williams earned an estimated $92 million in prize money, with $89.15 million coming from singles tournaments. She also earned roughly $2.84 million from doubles tournaments, most of which she entered with her sister Venus. According to the WTA, Serena earned a total of $94.8 million, which we assume includes bonuses from winning various Grand Slams. How does this compare to her sister, Venus Williams? Venus earned approximately $42.6 million from prize money during her career. Serena and Venus both had successful careers with high longevity. They competed against each other in Grand Slam tournament finals on nine occasions, with Serena winning seven and losing two. Endorsement Income Despite earning $94.8 million on the court, the bulk of Serena's income has been generated through her highly lucrative endorsement deals. In fact, since 2013, she has earned approximately $326 million from endorsements alone. That's almost quadruple the figure she earned from prize money. Estimates of her annual endorsement income are as follows: 2013 - $12 million 2014 - $11 million 2015 - $13 million 2016 - $20 million 2017 - $19 million 2018 - $19 million 2019 - $25 million 2020 - $32 million 2021 - $40 million 2022 - $45 million 2023 - $45 million 2024 - $45 million Puma Contract In February 1998, Serena Williams signed a five-year, $13 million endorsement contract with Puma. The company was reportedly not involved in tennis at the time, but saw Serena's potential and wanted to be a part of it. Nike Endorsement Contract When Serena's contract with Puma concluded in 2003, she signed a five-year, $40 million contract at Nike, equating to at least $8 million per year. She was also given various performance bonuses, potentially earning up to $11 million per year overall. Additional Endorsements Throughout the years, Williams has endorsed an extensive portfolio of brands, including: AT&T Audemars Piguet Beats by Dre Gatorade Gucci IBM Intel JP Morgan Chase Lincoln Motor Company Subway Wilson Miami Dolphins Investment In 2009, both Serena and Venus Williams reportedly invested a total of $10 million in the Miami Dolphins, which equated to an estimated 1% stake in the NFL team. Surprisingly, this made the sisters the first African American women to hold ownership in an NFL franchise. At the time, the team was worth approximately $1 billion, and according to Forbes' most recent calculations, the Dolphins are now worth $6.2 billion. If it's the case that the sisters did not sell their stake or have it diluted, and they own 0.5% each, Serena's stake is likely worth around $31 million.
