November Commentary

US exceptionalism is living on borrowed time.

In financial markets American exceptionalism is the only game in town right now. Given the various predicaments in other countries, it is logical to see a preference for US stocks although, at this point, future returns look precarious.

Being one step bolder, Ruchir Sharma (chair of Rockefeller International) suggested in the Financial Times this week that we are near the peak of the "mother of all bubbles". Why?

We see two primary reasons: government debt and stock market valuations.

The amount of debt required to grow the economy is staggering. Since 2015 federal debt has doubled, while GDP has grown 60%.

Said differently, it took over two hundred years to run up $18tn of government debt, and just nine years for the next $18tn.

GDP would have to grow 30% from here, while debt levels remained constant, to return to 2015's debt-to-GDP ratio (a point in time where congress introduced a debt ceiling to attempt to reduce the debt burden).

Annual interest costs are now over $1tn, double where they were four years ago.

Deficits and higher debt piles require financing from overseas investors. China has been selling Treasuries in recent years, while other countries, such as Japan, pick up the difference. This may reverse if domestic opportunities improve.

At the market lows in Oct-22 the S&P was trading bang on its long-term average PE multiple of 17x.

Since then, it is up 70%, while earnings are up just 7%.

Echoing and amplifying the move in debt-to-GDP, corporate earnings would need to grow 50% from here, while the market treads water, if it is to return to its historic average PE multiple.

Returns generated today are borrowed from the future.

While euphoria is in the air given the strength of returns this year, we continue to invest prudently, away from the crowd, capturing returns in a durable way which avoids exposure to valuation risks, inflation risks and interest rate shocks.

Wishing you all a very happy Christmas.
