Once upon a time, there was a bright-eyed boy named Tyron.
He had light blonde hair, a big smile, and a brain full of ideas.
Tyron loved building things, asking questions, and making up silly songs.
"I'm ready for big school!" he said proudly.
And off he went.

But school wasn't what Tyron expected.
The classroom was noisy. The words on the board danced and wriggled.
The other kids read out loud, fast and smooth.
When it was Tyron's turn, the letters just... didn't sit still.
He shrunk a little in his chair.

Every day, Tyron tried his best.
He sat up straight. He whispered the words and he even practiced at home.
But reading still felt like a giant mountain and no one seemed to see how hard he was climbing.
"Maybe I'm just not a reading kind of kid," he thought.

One rainy afternoon, Tyron hid his favourite storybook in his backpack.
"I don't need it," he muttered.
But deep inside, he missed the dragons and spaceships and silly pirates.
He just didn't feel like the stories were for kids like him.

That's when Miss Lane saw him.
She knelt beside his desk and asked,
"Tyron, do you know what I see?"
Tyron blinked and said
"A kid who can't read?"
Miss Lane smiled and replied,
"I see a storyteller waiting to be heard."

Miss Lane pulled out a magical book, that was blank on every page.
"This book," she whispered, "shows you as the hero!"
He touched the page and in a flash, there he was...
Tyron the Brave, riding a rocket through a rainbow sky!

Now reading felt different.
Because the story was about him.
He read to his teddy, to his mum, even to his dog!
He still made mistakes.
But he laughed, learned, and kept turning the pages.

One day, Tyron said,
"I wish every kid could see themselves as the hero in a story."
And when he grew up...
That's exactly what he did.

Tyron grew older, and his big idea grew too.
He filled notebooks with characters, doodles, and big dreams!
He shared stories with friends, who laughed and imagined right along with him.
Every story felt like a new adventure, and every adventure made the dream stronger.

Tyron made something special.
A place where stories are made just for you!
Where you are the hero, the explorer, the brave
knight, the silly chef, or even a time traveller!
That place is called Fabily.ai

And it all started with a boy...
...who found himself inside a story.
