Summary

Baldy Vintage wanted heavyweight fleece and tees with a washed look that felt natural across every style. Their drop date was coming up, so the colors, fabrics, and washes needed to line up nicely without slowing down the schedule.

What they needed

Getting the same wash effect on the fleece and jersey is always tricky. If the style differs even a little, the whole set feels off. They also wanted to keep shrinkage under control after washing.

How we approached it

We ran quick wash tests on both fabrics, adjusted the base cloth, and did a few small rounds until the look matched exactly what they wanted. Once they approved the samples, we moved straight into bulk and kept everything grouped so the style stayed consistent. The full 2,400-piece order finished in 15 days. The colors lined up across every style, and they reused the same wash for future releases.
