

MODERN DAY SLAVERY

Train employees and managers

We train staff in procurement and other areas within the company on how to look for and report signs of modern slavery inside the organisation and throughout the supply chain. Training should further explain and reinforce the organisation's code of conduct and principles for ethical business practices.

1. Identify Risks

Conduct assessments to identify and analyse supply chain risks, from end to end. This entails looking at direct and indirect suppliers, contractors and labour suppliers and taking steps to reduce risks within every link in the supply chain.

2. Perform Due Diligence

Conduct audits of supply chain operations to find out how labour and material is sourced and the prices paid to suppliers further down the supply chain.

3. Create a Supplier Code of Conduct

Implement written policies for suppliers that clearly outline standards and expectations for ethical behaviour in the areas of labour, health and safety and the environment. Along with a written Code of Conduct, suppliers can benefit from training that explains their contractual obligations to comply with ethical business standards and practices.

4. Profit with Integrity

Leadership should be incentivised to stop modern slavery because it is the correct thing to do. Consumers, investors, business partners and regulators expect a company and its entire supply chain to be ethical. Organisations choosing supply chain partners should consider vendor ethics, as well as quality and cost.
