July Challenge Tips By Diana Postlewait

How to use the plastic wrap watercolor technique--kerriewoodhouse.com

1. Begin with a wet loose painted background or subject
 You need lots of wet color to make this technique work. Be bold at this stage to avoid disappointment later. You can use just one color if you like, but lots of color works great!

2. Add scrunched plastic wrap, cling wrap or bubble wrap directly to the wet paint

Before the paint is dry pull off a piece of wrap and crumble it up. Place it directly on the surface of the wet paint making sure that the plastic and paper are in contact in several places. You can press the plastic down in different places and manipulate the shapes a little, but the joy of this technique is that you never really know what you are going to get. Add a weight on top (optional) and let it dry overnight. Once you see the sort of effects you can get, you can start to imagine how stretching the plastic into longer shapes might change your painting, or make bigger or smaller individual shapes by varying the amount of scrunching you do.

Leave to dry completely

This is the hard part. Walk away, and don't peek. To achieve an effect you need to let the paint dry completely under the wrap. Every time you touch or dislodge the plastic you are reducing the impact of this technique. I recommend leaving it dry overnight to be safe.

4. Remove the plastic and spend time with your first layer

Lift the plastic wrap from the perfectly dry painting and give yourself plenty of time to just look at the result. See what shapes you can find in the abstract results. Eventually your eyes will find the edges of petals or leaves, or maybe something else entirely.

5. Consider using references

If you know what kind of subject you are trying to paint - see if you can find some images of the subject for reference.

6. Use negative painting to build on your first layer

(SWS May 2025 Challenge Paintings - Negative Painting)
 Once you start you may find other shapes to bring out in your painting. One of the best ways to do this is negative painting. This technique can be used for backgrounds, trees, flowers and many more subjects of your choice.

THESE PAINTINGS are the first two I ever did with plastic wrap. From experience I can tell you the heavier wrap works better. But, try different weights and bubble wrap for different effects. If you are using it for a background, use a large piece. If you are using it for the subject(s) of your painting, you might want to use smaller pieces or even light-weight wrap depending on the effect you want. Letting it dry completely before removing the wrap is key.

You can put a weight on it to hold it down and increase the pattern or no weight and get a lighter pattern. Experiment.

Bring ALL of your Challenge Paintings to the September SWS General Meeting at Spokane Art Supply! This is from May to September. There will be 3 chances to win a SAS Gift Certificate!

August Challenge Tips

By Diana Postlewait

What is the purpose of a COLOR CHART?

Have you ever been puzzled about what colors to mix in a particular situation? Watercolor charts are all about mastering mixing. These simple charts help you learn how to mix your collection of paints and remember which ones you need to reproduce a particular hue. I'm always surprised by the huge variety of colors that can be created from just a few tubes of paint. If you do this exercise, it will help you understand how your own paints work together. You're going to do a lot of mixing! But that's the whole idea...You may be astonished by the colors your paints can produce!

How does a watercolor color chart work?

A watercolor chart is a grid of colored squares using all or some of the paints in your palette. The grid is labeled on the top and side axis with the names of all your paints. Each square in the chart is at the intersection of a row and a column of the chart.

You fill in each of the colored squares on your grid by mixing the color on the side axis with the color on the top axis.

(For example in the diagram Row 4 + Column F = 4F) The completed grid gives you an overview of the mixing range of your palette colors.

6 good reasons to make a watercolor mixing chart

I always recommend using single pigment and transparent watercolor paints. Why? Because if you mix too many pigments, it often ends up as a muddy dull color. I'm sure, like me, you prefer bright vivid colors in your paintings. Mixing single pigments is less inclined to produce flat colors. A color chart will help you identify which single pigments produce a desired color mix, and you may find some 2 or 3 pigment paints which mix badly!

Knowing how to mix blacks or grays with just two colors is extremely useful, (if you have a tube of black paint, you'll probably find you don't need it). A mixing chart will help you find which two colors mix beautifully to produce interesting grays and blacks. Sometimes you also need to reduce the intensity of a color (paint that comes directly from the tube is at its brightest, most intense hue). A lot of artists will be tempted to do this by adding black, but black will deaden your colors! It's much better to add a complementary hue, and your color chart will help you identify the right combination.

August was going to be a month for a break, mostly because of everyone being on vacation, hosting family or friends or just enjoying summer. However, you could pick one or two or even three of the previous challenges and practice them all in one painting. Or, if you find yourself just needing some time with your paints figuring out what you have and how you can use your colors, create some watercolor charts. Maybe you have done this before with the colors on your palette or maybe you have some "new" paints to explore in a color chart way. Here are some excerpts from Anthony Roebuck on Watercolor

Charts. Let's see what you create when we get back together in September.

Mixing greens can also be quite tricky.

When we go to mix paints, we find it difficult to pick the right combination to get the right shade of green. A color chart goes a long way to helping with this.

Pinks and skin tones can be particularly frustrating to mix.

A lot of beginners will mix red with white paint. The results are similar to when you try to mix a color by adding black. Your colors will look flat and uninspiring. There are several combinations that will produce great flesh tones, and your mixing chart will help you discover them.

Do you really need all those tubes of brown, indigo and violet?

Convenience mixtures like these are useful if you need a very specific color all the time, but you can probably mix these colors with your existing palette of paints. Making your own color chart could save you money because you'll know how to mix a color using two other paints. You may find that you end up using less colors. This is especially useful to know if you intend to paint while traveling, so you can make your own small travel palette.

Even if you have a limited palette, you'll probably find some pleasantly surprising mixing results along the way. And in the end a good chart will make your life easier. (I've used 8 colors for this example mixing chart, but you can use more or less. You can use any combination of colors you want to test.)

So sit back, grab a coffee and have some fun!

SWS in September!

Anji Grainger SEPTEMBER DEMO Textural Techniques in WC

at the SWS General Meeting
Saturday, September 20,
10:00 am to 12:00 pm
Spokane Art Supply,
1303 N. Monroe, Spokane

Anji is an award winning watercolorist and instructor. Anji began painting in acrylic. She later studied watercolor in Florence, Italy, and "plein air" techniques in Provence and Sicily. Anji's work derives its inspiration from the magic and wonders of nature. She is drawn to see and focus on what might not be seen or noticed and understands the importance of not suppressing what comes from within. She focuses on detail whether it's simply the blending or bleeding of two colors like one would see on a ripening peach or the finite lines and edges of a raindrop. Her current explorations are in the discovery of how elements of nature and texture react in watercolor to leave beautiful patterns and surprises.

September Challenge Tips

By Diana Postlewait

Drop Color or Wet 'n Wet

This exercise will come in handy for another challenge coming up. Drop color or Wet 'n Wet is very easy and can be used for a multitude of techniques in watercolor painting.

First, you can literally paint a "drop" using this technique. Put a drop of clean water on your paper where you want the "drop" to be. Next, with color on your brush, gently touch the wet drop of water and let the color run into the drop. Let it dry and finish by lifting some of the color from the center, adding shading or maybe another color to enhance the shape.

You can also wet your paper - really wet your paper - and drop in colors here and there for a more abstract feel. Good for abstract painting, colorful backgrounds and skies. This gives you more of a "pouring" feel to your painting.

Create soft edges with the wet 'n wet technique. Paint the specific area with clear water, add color, let it run or tilt your paper to encourage the direction of the run. As it dries, "drop" in more color in the areas that need more shading, more color or a different color. This is a good way to create a loose painting and good for some florals. Don't let it dry completely if you want the loose look.
