GONE. FAREWELL STUDIO

LIFE AFTER

INTRODUCTION

PRACTICAL AND EMOTIONAL SUPPORT FOR WHAT COMES NEXT

Life After is a support service offered by Gone. Farewell Studio to families in the weeks and months following a loss.

It is available as part of a full service farewell or as a standalone service for those who need guidance after a funeral has already taken place.

After the farewell, life continues - and with it, a mixture of practical responsibilities and emotional adjustments that can feel quietly overwhelming. There are documents to locate, organisations to notify, belongings to consider, and decisions to make - all at a moment when most people are still finding their footing.

Life After exists to offer gentle guidance through this period.

Not to do everything, but to help identify the right steps, the right support, and the right pace - so that what needs to be done feels manageable rather than daunting.

In the weeks following a death, Gone. can help provide clarity around the practical matters that tend to accumulate - identifying which organisations need to be notified, locating and organising important documents, understanding the sequence of administrative steps involved, and connecting families with trusted professional services where needed.

The goal is simply this - that the people left behind are able to move through this period with a little more confidence, and a little less alone.

BELONGINGS AND PERSONAL ARCHIVES

ONE OF THE MOST EMOTIONALLY COMPLEX TASKS AFTER A DEATH IS DECIDING WHAT TO DO WITH PERSONAL BELONGINGS

Among the most emotionally complex tasks that follow a death is deciding what to do with the belongings of the person who has died. Clothing, collections, photographs, books, objects of everyday life - these things carry meaning that is difficult to quantify and impossible to rush.

Gone. can help families approach this process thoughtfully - exploring options such as working with estate organisers or specialist clearing services, donating meaningful items to charities or causes the person cared about, redistributing belongings among family members in a considered way, or preserving particular items that hold deep sentimental value.

There is no right timeline for this work. Sometimes the most important thing is simply to have a thoughtful plan - one that allows difficult decisions to be made carefully, when the time feels right, rather than under pressure.

CONTINUING REMEMBRANCE

FOR MANY FAMILIES, REMEMBRANCE DOES NOT END WITH THE FAREWELL. NOR SHOULD IT.

Some people find comfort and meaning in creating ongoing rituals that honour the life that has been lived - small, intentional acts that mark the continuing presence of someone in the lives of those who loved them. These might include an annual remembrance dinner, a return visit to a place that mattered to them, a small gathering on a significant date, scattering ashes somewhere meaningful, or planting a tree or creating a garden in their memory.

Gone. can help families shape these moments - ensuring that remembrance, in whatever form it takes, feels as considered and personal as the farewell itself.

GRIEF, EMOTIONAL SUPPORT AND RE-ENGAGING WITH LIFE

GRIEF TAKES MANY FORMS AND UNFOLDS
DIFFERENTLY FOR EVERY PERSON

There is no correct way to move through it, and no timeline that applies to everyone.

Some people find it helpful to speak with a counsellor or therapist, or to connect with others who are navigating a similar experience. Gone. can help families find trusted grief counsellors and support services - people and organisations we know and would recommend without hesitation.

In time, some people begin to look for ways to reconnect with daily life and community - through creative pursuits, cultural activities, volunteering, or simply finding groups of people who share something they care about. Gone. can help with this too, identifying options that feel genuinely appropriate rather than generic, and supporting families to move forward at whatever pace feels right.

We remain available to the families we work with long after the farewell itself.

There is no obligation, and no expectation.

Simply an open door, for as long as it is needed.
