

What I want for America's next chapter is a culture where authentic human connection and free, open, and productive conversation are the norm, not the exception.

I imagine a future where the important conversations that are actually shaping communities and solving real problems don't mostly happen in Washington or on social media. They happen closer to home. In person, and in virtual spaces built to solve problems instead of spaces that elevate the most extreme ideas. Spaces where people with genuinely different backgrounds and perspectives come together not to win, but to understand — and from that understanding, to build something better than either side could have built alone.

That's what American business can stand for today. Not growth for the sake of growth, but growth that comes from the innovation and trust that improves people's lives, and restores our democratic society.

At AllSides, that's what we're building. We're not done. But we're closer than we've ever been.

Happy birthday, America. The best conversations, and our best days, are still ahead of us.
