

These are the results of your digital risk self-assessment.

Based on your responses, your current personal digital risk level is:

Low

What this means

Your responses indicate strong digital habits and limited areas of elevated exposure.

You are using protective measures that reduce the likelihood of account compromise, impersonation, or preventable exposure. At this level, risk is present but generally well managed.

Where your exposure may be higher

Even at a lower risk level, exposure can still exist in areas such as:

- Publicly available personal or professional information
- Social media accounts that reveal patterns, relationships, or travel
- Family members managing devices or accounts independently
- Increased visibility tied to leadership or advisory roles

What typically reduces risk at this level

Individuals in this range often maintain protection by:

- ✓ Continuing consistent password and multi-factor authentication practices
- ✓ Periodically reviewing social media privacy and public information
- ✓ Monitoring for impersonation and credential exposure
- ✓ Coordinating basic digital standards across household members

Why these habits matter

Research shows that using multi-factor authentication together with strong, unique passwords can reduce account compromise risk by up to 99%. Learning to recognize phishing attempts and verify links before clicking can reduce security-related risks by as much as 70%. Limiting what you share publicly on social media further reduces the information available for targeting or impersonation.

Richter Guardian provides the tools, monitoring, and professional guidance to help you implement and maintain these protective habits, including continuous oversight of identity, credential, and device-related risks.

Would you like a deeper review?

This summary reflects your responses to a brief self-assessment and highlights common areas of exposure. A more detailed review can help identify risks specific to your situation and clarify where to focus first.

Request a private consultation

richterguardian.com

To explore your situation in more detail, you can request a confidential consultation or reach out with questions to better understand your results and next steps.